Acknowledgements

I would like to thank George P. Hansen and Jessica Utts, whose parapsychology writings, programming source code, and statistical tables proved indispensable for designing my experiment and understanding potential psychic effects. I am also indebted to mathematician Cameron Bishop for helping me analyze this study's statistics and combinatorics; my six judges who tirelessly scored over 1,700 experiment results; talented remote viewers around the world who participated in this effort; and, the brilliant KayDee Kersten for being my editor, cheerleader, and adventure buddy on journeys into the unknown.

Introduction

I have been obsessed with the paranormal for most of my life. I saw my first ghost when I was 6 years old, began experimenting with magical spells by the time I was 10, and my bookshelves have always been crammed with tomes about extrasensory perception (ESP), astral projection, and other preternatural topics. I was especially consumed by the subject of clairvoyance — the power to see far-away objects, places, people, and events — after reading Stephen King's 1979 novel, The Dead Zone. The book's protagonist is unsettled by his newfound ability to see a person's past or future, and suddenly no secrets are safe (King).

Given my early interest in uncovering secrets, it is no surprise that I am also a longtime hacker. I taught myself computer programming as a teen in the 1980s, joined a group of hackers in my hometown, and pulled puckish pranks until a kind F.B.I. agent scared me straight when I was 14. Promising to use my powers for good, I went on to study computer science and cybersecurity, and have been protecting companies from cyber criminals, foreign intelligence services, and ironically, teenage hackers, for over 30 years (LinkedIn).

My two passions intersected in 2017 when I read a Wired article about how the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) had recently placed 930,000 newly declassified documents on the Internet, including a massive trove of reports related to the government's clandestine remote viewing program that had been operating secretly for decades (Newman). In the art and science of remote viewing (RV), "viewers" are trained to use clairvoyant powers to see and recall details about far-away targets, which for the government, included anything that might prove valuable for espionage or military intelligence (Defense Intelligence Agency, FY 81 1-20). Archived reports from the CIA, Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA), U.S. Army, and other agencies describe how seasoned remote viewers who were given nothing more than a set of coordinates successfully pulled confirmed details out of the air about foreign military sites (Stoner, 1979 3), missile installations (Stoner, 1979 5), and even hostages (Targ, Reality 4).

My interest piqued, and being a hacker, I scoured the CIA's documents to see if remote viewing had also been used to steal secrets from computers, but I found no examples after months of hunting. I tried searching next in academic and public databases, in case non-government researchers had conducted their own experiments involving "psychic hacking." However, searches in Google, Google Scholar, The Internet Archive, ProQuest, IEEE, ACM, parapsychology and cybersecurity journals, library databases, and social media discussion groups yielded no sustained and credible results.

Make no mistake, the CIA's trove revealed that computers had certainly been used in parapsychology research. Computers were used to collect data and manage experiments, for example, or to pick random numbers that were then used to serve up targets to remote viewers in random order (Lenz, et al. 151-158). Some psychics interacted with computer programs, including games that tested one's ability to sense the future (Varvoglis, Psychic 37-41). Other psychics tried to read computer displays from miles away, or use psychokinetic power to change outcomes of computer-generated random events (Kruth 233). In short, computers were mostly used as tools to facilitate psychic experimentation, rather than being targets for psychic hackers.

What I sought were experiments involving psychics using clairvoyant powers to describe secrets held inside computers. This was a different case than common paranormal lab experiments where a psychic tried to guess which picture would be shown next on a computer screen, or use psychokinesis to alter which random number a computer might guess next. I was seeking a parapsychology analogue to real-world hacking: namely, using psychic power to bypass cybersecurity defenses to retrieve and narrate secrets buried deep inside a machine's memory, CPU, or storage.

In cybersecurity terms, this kind of intrusion falls into the category of physical side-channel attacks, where an attacker bypasses trusted software and hardware defenses by dismantling a computer's hardware to read data directly from its chips, memory, or storage using electronic probes (Koeune and Standaert). The outcome of a clairvoyant side channel attack would be similar, with a psychic bypassing password prompts, access permissions, system monitoring, firewalls, and other typical computer defenses.

Security breaches are rampant. In 2021, there were "4,145 publicly disclosed breaches" that collectively exposed "over 22 billion records" (Security Magazine). IBM interviews with over 3,000 employees worldwide found that 83% of organizations had suffered a data breach as of 2022 (IBM 4-5), and on average, it took organizations almost 300 days to detect and contain a single breach, with a recovery cost of at least $4MM per incident (IBM 4-5, 24). Government systems have also been breached. In 2014, now-infamous NSA contractor Edward Snowden leaked 1.7 million secret documents that detailed fully operational spying methods (Perez). In 2015, the U.S. Office of Personnel Management was hacked, losing background investigation dossiers on 19.7 million federal employees, including their personal, medical, psychological, and financial histories (Office of Personnel Management). Considering that many of these organizations were hacked despite having cybersecurity protections in place (IBM 22-24), how much worse would the situation be if remote viewers could steal secrets from computers by magically bypassing all fancy cyber defenses?

The implications of psychic hacking would be staggering. Humanity's secrets stored in computers — messages, medical data, financial information, secret formulas, military plans, nuclear missile codes, you name it — would be at risk from remote viewers located thousands of miles away, since clairvoyant power does not seem to diminish over distance (Puthoff and Targ, Advanced 3). Passwords would be useless, since psychics could simply access targeted secrets in computer memory or storage directly without logging in. Placing computers in shielded environments would offer little protection, since remote viewing has been shown to easily pass through even copper Faraday cages (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 4, 31). Encryption might not be a viable defense either, since data must typically be decrypted at some point to be used, rendering it momentarily vulnerable (National Security Agency). Even secrets in a person's mind might be at risk, since wet-wired interfaces are coming soon to give computers direct access to neurons in human brains (Ienca and Haselager; Arthur).

Seeking answers with the goal of extending the U.S. government's research, I launched a double-blind remote viewing experiment in October of 2022 to test whether 146 participants around the world could describe randomly selected secret targets loaded into two laptop computers hosted in Los Angeles. The laptops were secured using standard cybersecurity controls, and the machines' screens were dimmed to black and covered with cardboard shields to ensure that access to data would require finding and retrieving the target data from the systems' circuitry or storage, rather than merely reading it from the computers' screens. Each subject was presented with targets that included a picture, a video clip, an ATM PIN number, and a passphrase, and participants were invited to describe their remote viewing impressions and guesses via writings and drawings. The experiment was successful, with conclusions that supported the U.S. government's findings that remote viewing abilities are real.

This dissertation will show that people can use remote viewing to psychically retrieve and describe data held inside of computers. This claim will be supported by a review of literary sources, and by statistically significant experiment results sufficient to reject the null hypothesis that effects observed were chance occurrences.

My hope is that this study will inspire future research into how best to protect the world's secrets from clairvoyance, which has the power to bypass cybersecurity defenses.

Review of Literature

Psychic Powers in The U.S. Government's Clandestine Remote Viewing Program

The U.S. government's clandestine remote viewing program can be traced back to the Stanford Research Institute (SRI) (Stoner 1979), a research facility started at Stanford University in the 1940s whose goal was to address "major issues facing society," although government funding helped ensure the lab would also "improve American capabilities in warfare" (Svanevik and Burgett). Advancements developed there included the world's first robotic surgery techniques and the first computer mouse, but also a "communications device that enabled American military intelligence operatives in Iraq to interview Iraqis" (Svanevik and Burgett). In 1971, SRI laser physicists Hal Puthoff and Russell Targ began investigating ESP, and with enough success that the CIA took an interest in 1972. A SRI-CIA partnership was formed, which went on to conduct 25,449 psychic experiment trials (May, et al. Review 2).

ESP is often divided into three chief categories: telepathy is psychically reading another's thoughts; clairvoyance is seeing or somehow knowing information about nonlocal events; and, precognition is knowing information that "could have only been obtained by knowledge of the future" (Utts, "Assessment" 25). Such psychic abilities are sometimes referred to collectively as "psi" (the Greek letter  $\Psi$ ) or alternatively, as "anomalous cognition" (May, et al., ESP 11).

Remote viewing is a focused form of clairvoyance in which a subject uses psychic ability to describe a remote "target" (Stoner n.d.) that could be anything: a place, person, photograph, video clip, object, or even text (Utts, "Assessment" 34). A subject may be given a description of the target to help focus efforts, but not always. Experimenters have found that subjects can describe a target even if given very little information about it. A subject might receive just a target's coordinates, just a case file number, or no targeting information at all, in which case the psychic would need to use preternatural skills to simply "know" how to locate the target based on the experiment's intention alone (Utts, "Assessment" 33; Targ, Limitless 10; U.S. Department of Defense, Memorandum 2).

In the early days of the CIA-SRI partnership, it became clear that remote viewing had the potential to serve as an intelligence-gathering source. In 1973, one remote viewer "was able to penetrate" into an NSA facility in West Virginia, where he proceeded to recite "classified codewords he 'read' from file folders" there (Stoner, 1979 3). In another 1973 experiment, psychic Ingo Swann used remote viewing to psychically "visit" the planet Jupiter. Captured in the session's audio recording and by Swann's own drawings, Swann described seeing icy bands around Jupiter "like the rings of Saturn," and the rings were indeed confirmed during a Voyager 1 flyby in 1979 (Targ, Reality 32). Also in 1979, the program attempted to locate a "missing navy aircraft," and per DIA documents, the plane "was located psychically within 15 miles" of the confirmed crash site (Defense Intelligence Agency, Presents 19). Working in parallel on its own ESP experiments, U.S. Air Force research confirmed in 1975 that remote viewing could "be used to monitor real-time activities" with accuracy not limited by distance, and with "spatial resolution" that was "accurate down to millimeters," even when electrical shielding was present (Defense Intelligence Agency, Psychoenergetics 17). Real-time monitoring included not only large-scale military activities, but also the "real-time tracking of known individuals" (Puthoff and Targ, Advanced 3). In one instance, a remote viewer was not only able to track a boat moving illegal drugs, but also zoom in on the drugs themselves; the viewer described where the drugs were hidden on the boat, and the text printed on the containers carrying "little white balls" of contraband (Defense Intelligence Agency, Project Number 8816).

PEDESTRIAN OVERPASS TARGET

*In this example of a SRI remote viewing experiment, a SRI clairvoyant described a pedestrian overpass target as a kind of "trough in the air" and drew the line illustration above (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 36).*

Meanwhile, U.S. Army Intelligence learned that the Soviets had also been researching psychic abilities since the 1960s (Atwater 1), and practically overnight, remote viewing in the Cold War era became a serious national security concern (Stoner, n.d., 2; Puthoff and Targ, Advanced 4). The U.S. Missile Intelligence Agency awarded a research contract to SRI to study Soviet missiles via remote viewing, and the U.S. Army awarded its own contract to SRI under the secret codename Gondola Wish to counter the Soviet "psychoenergetic" threat (Atwater 3; Defense Intelligence Agency, Presents 11-13). Using only a set of coordinates, Ingo Swann psychically penetrated a "missile field east of Moscow" where he "passed through a silo cover" to a control room that was paved in white tiles (Stoner, 1979 5). In another case, four remote viewers correctly identified "long, tubular, light-colored, silver objects" similar to rockets with details "normally reserved for the detonation of a nuclear device" (Defense Intelligence Agency, Memo 2). The objects were later confirmed to be upgraded Soviet SS17 ICBMs (Defense Intelligence Agency, Memo 1-2).

Between 1978 and 1980, "government sponsorship moved [from SRI] to a program at Science Applications International Corporation (SAIC)" in Menlo Park, California (Mumford, et al. 3; Science Applications International Corporation), which operated with tighter "methodological rigor" (Utts, "Assessment" 30) under the "direction of Dr. Edwin May, who had been employed in the SRI program since the mid-1970s" (Mumford, et al. 4). The DIA consolidated the U.S. government's research program with SAIC into a new black budget Special Access Program codenamed Grill Flame to hide the fact that the government was involved in paranormal research at all (Defense Intelligence Agency, Senate 4.; U.S. Army Materiel Systems [sic] 7).

The program received funding for "novel intelligence collection techniques," and by 1983, Grill Flame submitted a secret report to Congress confirming that remote viewing was real and had intelligence applications (U.S. Department of Defense, Annual 6). Over time, some of these applications would include identifying "key facilities in Tehran during the 1979-81 hostage crisis" and the whereabouts of "Manuel Noriega during the US raid on Panama in 1989," as well as the locations of "Silkworm missiles along the Persian Gulf during the Iran-Iraq war . . . and the locations of Scud missiles during Desert Storm" (Schnabel).

Known variously by the codenames Sun Streak, Center Lane, and ultimately, Star Gate, the government's clandestine program operated until it was shut down in 1996, with its documents finally declassified in 2002 (Warshaw 1-2). The program's demise was spurred by a 1995 report recommending that psi research no longer be funded (Mumford, et al. 6), with the conclusions that psychic data gathered had "limited applicability and utility for intelligence gathering operations" (Mumford, et al. 5); that the program had failed to prove how remote viewing worked, or that remote viewing was the true agent behind the observed effects (Mumford, et al. 4); that intelligence provided by remote viewers had not been consistent (Mumford, et al. 5); and, that the data provided had never once "been used to guide intelligence operations" (Mumford, et al. 5).

The report's conclusions were problematic on many fronts, starting with the report's admission that its panel had focused its critique "most closely on the most recent work done by SAIC" (Utts, "Assessment" 25). This suggests that psychic successes during the early pioneering work at SRI for nearly a decade — long before SAIC — were not given equal billing during the panel's investigation.

Second, the claims that there was little "utility for intelligence" derived from psychic sources contradict the U.S. government's own documented cases where psychic intelligence was successfully employed. See the handful of examples above, the recollections of SRI researchers Targ (Reality) or May (May, et al., Meta-Analysis), or the trove of evidence available in the CIA's own declassified repository for more examples. If those are insufficient, perhaps look to

Joe McMoneagle, the program's earliest psychic spy, whose Legion of Merit award granted in 1984 states that he "used his talents and expertise in the execution of more than 200 missions" that produced "elements of information" that were "unavailable from any other source" for the "Joint Chiefs of Staff, DIA, NSA, CIA, DEA, and Secret Service" (May, et al., ESP 129).

Third, the objection that data from psychic sessions was "inconsistent" is not a challenge unique to remote viewing. The work of intelligence is fraught with ambiguity by its very nature; agents collecting intelligence in the field expect to encounter inconsistencies when working with human sources, for example (U.S. Army Headquarters 168).

Fourth, cancellation of the program on the grounds that it had failed to ascertain how psychic seeing works was an unfair burden, since Science cannot explain how many aspects of human learning, memory, or love operate either (Utts, "Assessment" 99).

Finally, the report's final conclusions seem to ignore Dr. Jessica Utts — the report's own leading panelist — who makes the case that psychic research should continue. Dr. Utts — a Professor Emerita of Statistics at the University of California, and a past Koestler Chair of Parapsychology at the University of Edinburgh — writes in the report that the U.S. government's experiments met their prima facie burden of proving that a real anomalous phenomenon exists (Utts, "Assessment" 32). Remote viewing's effects were "demonstrated" (Utts, "Assessment" 50) with "statistical results" that were "overwhelming" (Utts, "Assessment" 35), and whose outcomes were replicated in independent labs (Utts, "Assessment" 36) with "consistency [that] cannot be readily explained by claims of flaws or fraud" (Utts, "Assessment" 23). Utts urges that continuing to "look for proof" of RV is therefore a waste of "valuable resources" that should instead be directed at trying to understand "how this ability works" (Utts, "Assessment" 50) — which collides head-on with the report's own conclusion that funding should cease because RV was not understood.

In fairness, the report cites some weaknesses found in corners of the program's research reviewed. For certain experiments, the number of trials were too few to prove psychic functioning conclusively; in others, too many uncontrolled variables made replication of some experiments challenging (Hyman 65); and, in some lab conditions, the same target images were used repeatedly with the same viewers, allowing psychics to become "familiar with the range of [possible targets] since they were usually shown the answer at the end of each remote viewing session" (Utts, "Assessment" 28-29).

What is telling, however, is that despite all of the experiment mistakes made, the report concedes that remote viewing is a proven human ability (Utts, "Assessment" 35) — even the most egregious errors made by researchers were dwarfed by the statistical weight of psychic activity measured. Also, nowhere in its pages does the report dispute the government's declassified tales of sensational intelligence successes — of finding missiles, hostages, missing aircraft, and the like — that were made possible by remote viewing.

Theories of Remote Viewing's Operation

While the U.S. government conceded that remote viewing is real, Science cannot say how remote viewing works, although theories exist (Targ, Reality 204; Targ, Limitless 11; Mumford, et al. 4). Explanations for psi from antiquity until the 1800s included planetary influences, and the idea that the human soul reflected the world at large (Arthur 105-106) until Sir Isaac Newton's concept of "causality was enthroned as the absolute ruler of matter and mind" (Arthur 117). Over a century later, SRI remote viewing researcher Targ would suggest that quantum entanglement may allow the human mind to connect with local information that is somehow linked to far-away events on a quantum scale (Targ, Reality 203-206). Alternatively, perhaps the universe is a hologram in which all possible information is encoded at every given point that a psychic has learned how to decode (Targ, Reality 203-206). Beloff suggests that psi may operate via causation that is different from "physical processes" — perhaps psi instead functions purely via "teleological" or "goal-oriented" causation" (Beloff 89). In this model, a psychic with a strong mental desire achieves the desired goal without a physical cause, and the phenomenon can "be understood only in terms of the ends" (Beloff 98). Finally, if precognition is "knowledge of a future state of the participant's mind," rather than knowledge of some future "objective state of the physical world," perhaps remote viewing is actually sensing what one will think about presently obscured targets in the future when (and if) they are revealed (Defense Intelligence Agency, Quantum 13).

Subject Selection

Many U.S. government findings were related to the selection of psychic subjects. While many labs used gifted psychics repeatedly, analysis of thousands of experiment rounds found that "the basic psi-perceptual phenomena are not unique to 'gifted' psychics" (Swann 7). Many people have some psychic ability, although right-brained creative types may have more success than left-brained types (U.S. Department of Defense, Annual 9-10), and only about 1% of people have a "natural remote viewing ability" (May, et al., Review 2).

Some researchers preferred to "stay away from 'superstar' psychics because of [these subjects'] eccentricities" (Watt, Trip 1). Fortunately, experiments had success with "untrained subjects who proved competent" (Puthoff and Targ, Advanced 4), and performance could sometimes be improved through training (Swann 7; U.S. Department of Defense, Annual 6). Sometimes talented subjects were chosen from a pool of potential participants, depending on how high they scored on an initial psychic test (Varvoglis, Psychic 36), and in other experiments, groupings of subjects were reshuffled mid-study to take advantage of certain participants' psychological states or psychic skills that were discovered (Kruth 242).

Belief has also been found to play a role in psychic functioning. Government training materials show that before a mission, remote viewers practiced energizing "flight mode [cerebral] hemispheric functioning" and concentrating on a "focused intent," which imply a considerable level of belief (Defense Intelligence Agency, ERV Lecture 2). A meta-analysis of 4,500 participants across 73 studies found that stronger psychic performance was positively correlated with the belief that psychic powers are real (Lawrence; Wiseman and Greening; Storm). This "sheep-goat effect" — where "sheep" are "confident about the reality of psi," and "goats" are people who doubt — was first described by Gertrude Schmeidler in 1942 after conducting psychic tests using ESP cards (Varvoglis, "Sheep").

Experiment Protocols

The U.S. government's remote viewing program experimented with many testing protocols. Experiments were typically either forced-choice — a subject was asked to match a target's details against multiple-choice options — or free-response, where the subject could draw, write, or speak impressions that came to mind (Utts, "Assessment" 34). Remote viewers were led through psychic warm-up exercises, and trained on how best to visualize and describe targets (Defense Intelligence Agency, ERV Lecture 2; Defense Intelligence Agency, Grill).

Targets could be objects, pictures, or even places. For years, National Geographic magazine photos were used as picture targets (Defense Intelligence Agency, Psychoenergetics 47). Other times, a researcher acting as a psychic "beacon" would travel to a selected remote target site, which the remote viewer would then describe (U.S. Army Materiel Systems [sic] 18).

It was important that targets were selected randomly and in a double-blind manner so subjects could not simply guess targets, or read targets telepathically from researchers' minds (Hardy, et al. 35, 111). Choosing a strong source of randomness was also important, since psychics had demonstrated they could alter random outcomes through "psychic perturbation" (Stanford Research Institute, Remote 1-4).

In some experiments, a test administrator (often called a "monitor") would ask a subject guiding questions to elicit details about targets. Some monitors also gave feedback on successes and failures to help subjects calibrate their clairvoyant skills (Utts, "Assessment" 26). Feedback was not necessary for psychic successes, however (May and Spottiswoode 55). Targ suggests that feedback can be counterproductive because it tends to encourage subjects to see their targets in the future precognitively, rather than clairvoyantly in real time (Targ, Limitless 43).

Some protocols were concerned with accuracy. For example, first-time subjects tended to have higher success rates during initial attempts, so researchers had to determine if this "first time effect" would skew overall experiment results or not (May, et al., "Anomalous" 29). Viewers were taught to only describe "raw perception," rather than trying to analyze what they were seeing (May, et al., "Anomalous" 29), because analysis tended to interfere with the remote viewing process itself, and drawing conclusions too early was problematic, since psychic information could arrive "piecemeal" with details out of order (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 65).

Arriving details were frequently abstract, since information was surfacing from intuition that was heavily symbolic, and the unconscious mind cannot be described directly (Jung 156-167). Subjects had to "interpret" impulses they sensed. A subject was more apt to describe a "filing thing" that was "heavy, cold, and metal" than flatly announce the target was a "filing cabinet" (Defense Intelligence Agency, Project Number 8728 3). Researchers also found that increasing a clairvoyant's physical distance from a target did not affect psychic power; that drawing pictures increased psychic accuracy; and, that intention was a key ingredient for successful remote viewing (Targ, Limitless 10-11). Using multiple subjects to "see" a target also tended to provide "better signal-to-noise ratio than target identification by a single individual" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 57).

Some targets were harder than others. Anecdotal evidence found that motionless targets were harder than moving targets (Delanoy 236). Boring targets were harder than targets with emotional content (Delanoy 233-240), and identifying a target's form was easier than sensing its function (Delanoy 237; Watt, "Characteristics" 29). Researchers also found that seeing numbers was harder than seeing picture targets, because a person "already [had] crystal-clear mental images" of all numbers 0 through 9 (Targ, Limitless 43). Based on this logic, it would follow that guessing letters would also be difficult. Regardless, remote viewers could still identify letters and numbers on many occasions, even if these alphanumeric targets were concealed (Puthoff and Targ, Advanced 3; Defense Intelligence Agency, Project Number 8728 3; U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command 9).

After a randomly chosen target was assigned, the remote viewer might be given select details about the target, but often the targeting information would only consist of a set of coordinates, or even just a case number. During the government's Sun Streak program period, remote viewers were given coordinates, but they were often encrypted, rendering them unreadable to ordinary humans (U.S. Department of Defense, Memorandum 2). In cases like these, a psychic had to trust that the experiment's intention would be sufficient to locate the target.

Judging Experiments

In the U.S. government's clandestine program literature, two standards were common for evaluating whether the outcome of an experiment was likely paranormal and not purely chance.

Summarized in 1979 by Grill Flame Committee Chairman Frank Cartwright, the first standard was informal, and simply the act of observing with common sense. An experiment outcome so startlingly detailed, unlikely, and honest would "force the observation" among witnesses that "something may be missing in the present set of [known] physical laws" to explain the event (Cartwright 2). In the same way the "magnetic compass provided accurate navigation" long before Science explained how it worked, the "sole criterion" for judging a remote viewing event was simply, "does it work?" (Cartwright 3). Cartwright contended that it was "improbable" that Science would explain how remote viewing worked anytime soon (Cartwright 1), so a utilitarian approach was preferable: rather than waiting for Science to catch up with psi capabilities that were obvious to the naked eye, the only psi proof needed was utility, which for the government's purposes, meant the "naked eye" similarity of a target to the remote viewer's description of it (Cartwright 3). The more unique or numerous the details between a target and the psychic's description of it, the more likely psi was present. If a remote viewer drew a diagram of a target, and the picture contained numerous details that were specific, the matching details were considered to "provide circumstantial evidence for [the presence of] an information channel" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 57). Some details were startlingly specific. When researchers traveled to a remote site to serve as beacons, some subjects were able to describe details at the site that were present, but not immediately visible to the researchers standing there. One subject "described and drew a belt drive at the top of a drill press that was invisible even to the remote experimenter who was operating the machine," and another subject described "a number of items [that were not visible because they were hidden] behind shrubbery" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 65).

Central to the above standard is the principle of reasonable doubt, which is doubt "based upon reason and common sense" that arise "from a careful and impartial consideration of all the evidence, or from lack of evidence" (U.S. Courts for the Ninth Circuit). Researchers as "prosecutors" submit their "case" that observed psi effects are supernatural, and a jury of observers rejects the "charges" if there is the slightest doubt that an outcome could be the result of coincidence, chance, fraud, or known laws of physics. When a defendant is found guilty, the jury has expressed that "there is no other reasonable explanation" other than what has been charged (Cornell Law School). Writing in the Marquette Law Review, Missouri-Columbia law professor Henry L. Chambers, Jr. argues that guilty verdicts are considered to "accurately reflect the truth" with practical certainty (Chambers 659), which is the "highest level of certainty an individual can have in the absence of absolute certainty" (Chambers 662), and unfortunately absolute certainty is not available in trials, since it would require a formal mathematical proof (Chambers 660). If we take this legal framing of the observation model to its extreme, it is implied that if society accepts jury judgement based on observation and reason as sufficient to condemn humans to prison or even death, then observation and reason should be sufficient to judge whether a remote viewing outcome is likely paranormal or not.

The second standard was statistical. A chief "statistic of interest [was] the Sum of Ranks" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 30), also known as rank-order scoring. In this double-blind method, judges compared a subject's psychic submission against a set of potential targets. The set consisted of the actual target, plus randomly selected decoy targets, all in random order. Judges ranked the potential targets in ascending order (1st, 2nd, etc.) from the best match to the worst, with "lower values indicating better matches" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 30). Judges' scores were then summed, and the one-tailed probability was calculated for whether the "indicated sum of ranks or less would occur by chance" (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 32). If all judges correctly matched a submission against its actual target and in first place, this would be considered a psychic hit, and with enough trials over time, a calculation showing a low probability that judges' scores were chance would be an indicator that a strong force other than chance was at work.

Another statistic advocated by May, et al. was Figure of Merit, which was calculated by multiplying accuracy and reliability scores together (May, et al., "Anomalous" 31-33; Stanford Research Institute, Enhanced). A referee would enumerate all details in a target, and then give each detail a fractional score between 0 and 1 to indicate how prevalent the detail was in the target. Next, each detail was compared to the remote viewer's submission, and if the detail matched, the analyst would receive points that were eventually used to calculate accuracy, reliability, and a final Figure of Merit score representing how similar a submission and target were.

Computers as Remote Viewing Targets

The U.S. government used computers in psi research, although rarely as targets. Computers were more often used to record subjects' sessions, capture participants' physiological data, house information in databases, and generate random numbers that served as targets (Lenz, et al. 151, 158; May, et al., Review 6).

Although I found no data explaining why computers were not chosen often as targets, anecdotal evidence suggests that it may have been due to the novelty of computers at the time. The personal computer industry as we know it did not begin until about 1977 (Britannica), so it is unlikely that computers were part of early researchers' gestalt, both because computers were complex and not widely available, and because they would not have been viewed as widespread bearers of secrets worth targeting like they are today.

In support for this claim, the earliest psi computer lab I found in the CIA's literature opened circa 1980 at Duke University (Lenz, et al.). The lab featured a closet-sized DEC PDP/45 computer with 16K of memory that was dedicated to capturing psi data and running statistical software (Lenz, et al. 152-153). Reading through lab descriptions written by Duke researchers, it is apparent that they were proud of the computer, finding it "gratifying" with "so much computing power" (Lenz, et al. 167). Writing about a visit to Duke's lab in 1981, a Grill Flame project manager reflected on the enormous challenges of building such a lab, whose components took "5-6 years to develop" after finally receiving funding that was "long awaited" (Watt, Trip 1). Given that obtaining computers was a major undertaking for institutions in the 1970s, and that such systems were seen as serious Science tools, it is no wonder computers were not often chosen as psychic targets during that era.

There were cases where computers or computer data made incidental appearances adjacent to targets. One subject "saw a computer terminal with relay racks in the background" while remote viewing into a lab (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 56). Another visualized "printouts that were coming out of [a] computer" (U.S. Army Intelligence and Security Command 9). A third managed a hit rate of 76% while guessing binary data over 100 trials, although the data was not in a computer (Humphrey 2).

Some reports hinted that a computer might have been a target in some experiments, but details were too scant to be sure. In one experiment, a subject "gained entry to a computer by mentally picturing, then using, [its] access code" (Stoner, n.d. 4), yet specifics are missing. Did the subject really target the computer and see the access code stored in it, or was the access code stored somewhere else that was targeted instead? The latter seems probable, since the same document references another experiment where a subject obtained "classified code word documents" stored in a filing cabinet (Stoner, n.d. 4), so perhaps the computer access codes were stored there as well.

Psi-themed computer games were sometimes used as targets. In one software package offering four solitaire games, subjects used precognition to guess which game would allow them to obtain the highest score (Palmer, "Covert"). In another game called "ESPerciser," subjects tried to "exert influence" over different colored backgrounds, and use precognition to guess outcomes (Palmer, "External"). While playing "Mind Machine," participants would guess whether a virtual coin toss generated by the computer would be heads or tails (Wiseman and Greening). Finally, in games included in the psi testing software "PsiLab II," subjects tried to sense or influence whether computer-generated random bits would move in one direction or another (Varvoglis, Psychic). These examples involved interacting with computers and data, but none had subjects trying to describe data stored in the computers in real time.

In a joint experiment carried out by SRI and the U.S. Army between 1979 and 1980 that also involved influencing outcomes, a psychic was able to introduce detectable bias into a series of randomly generated binary 1's and 0's. In a string of binary bits supposedly random, the participant was able to mentally "sway" or "remotely perturb" the composition of bits toward more 1's or 0's than what would be expected if the stream were indeed random, and to such a degree that 87 trials were successful out of 700, which was statistically significant (Stanford Research Institute, Remote 1-4). This is arguably an example of a side channel attack, since it involves affecting computational processes directly. However, while the psychic could alter outcomes blindly, there is no indication the subject could "read" and describe the data bits flowing through the computer, so this would be unlike my experiment's stated goal, which is outright data theft.

In the many cases I evaluated for signs of a subject describing secrets held in a computer, one of the closest I found was an experiment where a machine would randomly select one of four picture slides, and then reveal the selection after the subject pushed a button to guess which slide had been chosen (Defense Intelligence Agency, Four-State 2-3). The "secret data" in this case was a square-wave oscillator counter that held the current answer's state until the subject made a guess. While this example involves trying to guess something held in a computer, it is different from my research's stated goal because there is no indication that the subject was thought to be "reading" the data in the counter itself; the literature does not say the subject announced the counter's internal state, or that the subject had any clue of how the counter's internal state mapped to the four slides. It is more likely that the subject was able to blindly sense the internal state of the machine in a general way, without knowing what "secret" the counter held.

A similar example involved an experiment where subjects tried to guess which of four images shown on a computer screen was the actual target, with three images being decoys, and each round's actual target randomly selected by the computer before the round began (Honorton). Like the previous example, this case is not the same as my research goal. Subjects here were identifying pictures, rather than the real "secret data," which was the randomly generated pointer held in the computer's memory that identified which picture had been selected. Even if we wanted to count the pictures as "secrets," all of them were readily visible on screen, so subjects did not need to exert effort "reading" the pictures from deep within the computer.

Difficulties of Using Remote Viewing to Target Computer Data

As discussed above, there were very few cases in U.S. government literature of remote viewers accessing data in computers.

One reason for this could be that computers are very technical. Understanding and mentally navigating their architectures can be challenging, even for someone (like me) who has worked with them professionally for decades. If psychic teams were not computer-literate, it may have been difficult for handlers to communicate tasks to psychics, and for remote viewers to convey what they were seeing, if only for the sheer number of components in a computer system. In this dissertation's experiment, for example, laptops containing picture, video, and text targets were equipped with CPUs containing 500 million transistors and roughly 3MB of cache memory (Hinum); between 6 and 8 gigabytes (GB) of Random Access Memory (RAM); and, 500GB of internal hard disk storage that contained about 20GB of operating system and program files. The targets were stored on the laptops' internal hard disks, and displayed on the laptops' screens. Each computer's targets were changed nightly, with each new set of picture, video, and text targets requiring a maximum of 2 megabytes (MB) of storage in RAM (while being displayed), and also on disk (while in storage). Researchers unfamiliar with these kinds of technical details might find it hard to control the variables required to reliably carry out remote viewing experiments where computers were targets.

A second reason why accessing computer data clairvoyantly may prove difficult is that such data is not present as a singular atomic unit. In our case, for example, the 2MB of target data was stored in files on each laptop's hard disk, where parts of the data were likely interleaved and dispersed alongside the other 18GB of data already stored on the disk, depending on how contiguous the disk's available storage blocks happened to be at the time of storage (Garfinkel). When the targets' data files were read by the computer from the disk's magnetic surface for eventual display, the data was converted into electrical impulses and binary (Chaudhary and Kansal) before entering processing circuitry, memory, and then higher structures of operating system software, memory mappings, numeric and character encodings, programming language variables, and the like, before arriving at the computer's display hardware consisting of copper wires, electrode layers, and polarizing surfaces (Lee and Cooper).

In other words, data targets were not in a single place; the bits of data were broken up, diffused, transmitted, translated, and reassembled in magnetic storage, electronic streams, hardware chips, and software structures. If the information psychically sought really existed only as transient and decentered data streams passing through plural locations in a variety of states (electronic, binary, encoded, arrayed, etc.), where in the computer should a remote viewer

"arrive" to "read" (or perhaps, "assemble" or "decode") the so-called "pictures," "videos," and "text"? The difficulty of where to "enter" a computer would explain why even when computers and other electronic devices made appearances in government experiments, remote viewers defaulted to describing the machines' external qualities (e.g., visual and tactile sensations, audible noises, etc.) rather than features or data inside systems (Defense Intelligence Agency, Session Number 11; Defense Intelligence Agency, Session Number 02).

In fairness, we could ask these same questions of many Parapsychology experiments where psychics somehow manage to tease information out of impossibly complex systems. Take telepathy, for example: given that "thought" in the human brain exists as electrical impulses traveling across billions of neurons living in a cranial mass of fats, proteins, water, and carbohydrates (Johns Hopkins Medicine), where in that matter should a telepath "arrive" in order to "read" it? Fortunately, not knowing how such miracles work does not preclude Science from demonstrating that they occur, and this dissertation is no different, since its primary aim is proving that psychic hacking is possible, while leaving questions of "how" for future studies to answer.

Methods

Experiment Design Overview

The public was invited to participate in a remote viewing study whose advertised goal was to test whether a person could use psychic powers to describe data present in a computer. Due to COVID-19 pandemic concerns, the experiment was conducted safely via a website on the Internet (www.psychicexperiment.org).

PSYCHIC EXPERIMENT

Welcome to The Psychic Experiment! As part of a school project, I'm researching whether people can use psychic powers to see data in a computer that's far away — and you can be part of it!

If you believe psychic powers are real, I'd love for you to participate! It only takes minutes, and you'll be entered into a drawing to win a $200 Amazon gift card!

Here's a 1-minute introduction:

Can Psychics Really See Into Computers?

I hope to find out! What scientists do know is that clairvoyants have been able to describe landscapes, buildings, people, and other things thousands of miles away in real time.

There's so much evidence, in fact, that the CIA and foreign governments have spent considerable time and money investigating "remote viewing" as a tool for spying. The top secret Stargate Project, for example, has been experimenting with psychic abilities since the 1970s, and the results were often amazing.

*The top portion of the experiment home page at www.psychicexperiment.org is shown, which included a short video describing the project (Wichmann, Psychic).*

After digitally signing a participant consent agreement, subjects completed a survey about their beliefs and prior psychic experiences. Then, over the course of three test rounds, each participant tried to identify three randomly chosen targets: a picture, an ATM PIN, and a randomly generated multi-word passphrase. Subjects were told that all three targets were stored on a secure laptop computer housed in a closet in Los Angeles. To aid psychic targeting, subjects were shown what they believed was a live video feed of the target laptop sitting in its closet. The three targets (the picture, plus computer icons representing the files containing the PIN and passphrase) were all displayed on the laptop's screen, but the screen was not visible to subjects because of how it was angled. A fourth target — a looping, silent video clip — was also present on the laptop screen as an experiment control, but subjects were not informed of this. Subjects were asked to supply a written description of their general feelings and psychic impressions; an actual guess of each target's identity; and, an optional drawing.

In truth, not everything was how it appeared. The live feed of the target laptop shown on the experiment website was staged. There were actually two target laptops in case one failed, and while picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets were displayed on their screens, the screens were dimmed to black and covered with cardboard shields, so targets were not visible to the naked eye. The reasons for this design will be made clear in discussions to follow.

To help subjects zero in on targets, subjects on the experiment website were shown what they believed was a live feed of the target laptop (Wichmann, Psychic). The parrot (which could instead be a tiger, depending on details described later) above the laptop served as a psychic beacon to help guide psychics to the computer. Although the picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets were displayed on the computer's screen, the screen was angled down such that its contents were not visible to subjects. In truth, this live feed was staged, for reasons given later.

The experiment ran from October 23 to November 6, 2022, after which judging began. Each submission was first scored by three independent judges, who used rank-order scoring to match a submission against five possible targets that included the actual target, plus four randomly chosen decoys (a judge picked the best match, second-best match, and so on). If enough judges correctly matched a submission to the actual target, the submission moved to a second phase of judging, where more detailed analysis was performed. Judging was double-blind, meaning neither judges nor I knew what the actual targets or decoys were until after judging was completed.

Participants and Promotion

The experiment was open to the public, rather than being limited only to experienced remote viewers. I chose this route because a large number of participants was likely needed to demonstrate psychic effects with statistical significance, and although I did not have access to a large pool of vetted psychics, Puthoff and Targ cited earlier found that people without previous psychic experiences can possess clairvoyant talent. Therefore, like Kruth (242), my vetting strategy was to obtain as many participants as possible, and then focus deep analysis on participants who showed psychic promise.

Participants were drawn from several sources. I contacted professional mediums and asked them to participate. Other participants were personal friends who had a strong interest in psychic phenomena, or general experience with the occult. As a longtime shamanic practitioner, I also reached out to shaman peers who had experience gathering nonlocal information while in altered states of consciousness. The remaining subjects were attracted from Facebook, where I ran social media ads promoting the experiment.

I developed a promotional strategy to entice visitors into completing the study in its entirety. The experiment website was designed to appeal to a general audience using plain language that excluded technical terms and slang. I also created a promotional video that provided historical context for the experiment (Wichmann, Clairvoyance). Finally, by participating, subjects were entered into random drawings to win $200 Amazon shopping cards; promised that they would receive copies of their psychic experiment results via email; and, assured that experiment results would remain anonymous, if privacy was a concern.

The promotional materials avoided the term "hacking," since this might give subjects pause. Was the experiment engaged in illegal hacking activity? Was it gathering intelligence about people who would be later targeted for fraud, similar to how online surveys have been known to harvest password-guessing hints from people (Polakis, et al.)? For these reasons, simply saying that participants would attempt to "see" data inside computers was a more benign-sounding message.

Subjects were allowed to participate at any time of day or night. While this may not have been ideal, since certain time windows have been shown to be more optimal than others for psychic functioning (Spottiswoode), it was important to maintain maximum flexibility to attract as many people as possible. Further, if enough people participated, it might still be possible to analyze whether optimal time windows affected psychic performance, since subjects' geolocation data and submission timestamps were collected during the experiment.

Experiment Website and Subject Consent Agreement

The experiment website led visitors through an initial sign-up process. The homepage described the study's goals, and what participants would be asked to do. An input form then collected a visitor's first name and email address, and required that the subject click a checkbox affirming that they accepted the experiment's consent agreement. The agreement described the experiment in detail, explained how data collected would be used, and required the subject to grant copyright permissions allowing the study to publish any text or images submitted. Finally, the website emailed the subject an experiment website login link that was unique; when the subject opened the email and clicked the link, their web browser was directed to a secure starting page on the website where the experiment began. See Appendix A for the agreement text.

Survey

After arriving at the website's secure experiment page, subjects were presented with an intake survey to collect data about beliefs and experiences related to psychic abilities. The survey was adapted from the Revised Paranormal Belief Scale, and the Australian Sheep-Goat Scale, which measure the degree to which participants believe in paranormal powers (Tobacyk; Drinkwater, et al.). See Appendix B for a copy of the survey.

Structure of Experiment Rounds

Subjects were then presented with three psychic experiment rounds. At the start of every round, participants were shown what they believed was a live video feed of the target laptop computer sitting alone in a closet (the live feed was actually staged, as noted earlier). Subjects were told that the desired psychic target was present in the computer, and that the target was visible on the laptop's screen. However, the laptop's screen (which doubled as the laptop's lid) was angled downward in the almost-closed position as shown earlier in Figure 3, so no contents were visible.

Also visible in the video feed was a picture of an animal taped to the closet wall just above the laptop. The animal picture varied — it was either a tiger or parrot, depending on technical details described later. The picture served as a "psychic beacon" similar to beacons, coordinates, and other targeting hints provided to psychics in past government experiments (U.S. Department of Defense, Memorandum 2).

In round one, subjects were asked to describe a randomly chosen picture that was being displayed on the laptop's screen. No part of the picture was visible in the video feed, since the laptop's lid was nearly shut.

In round two, subjects tried to name randomly generated ATM PIN numbers stored in a file on the laptop. To help with targeting, subjects were shown an apparently live close-up feed of the laptop's desktop interface, where the ATM PIN file icon and the file's filename were visible.

In the final round, subjects were asked to describe a randomly generated multi-word passphrase (e.g., BLUE ARROW SINGS SUN) stored in a file on the target laptop. As with the ATM PIN round, a close-up feed of the passphrase file's icon and filename were shown to help with targeting.

During all three rounds, a fourth silent target — a randomly chosen, looping silent video clip — was also present on the target laptop's screen, but its existence was not divulged to participants. The video was included in the experiment because visual motion has been shown to attract remote viewers' psychic attention more readily than static images (Watt, "Characteristics" 28). More importantly, a participant able to describe the video's content — despite not being told that a video was even present — might suggest that psychic hackers can root out secrets in a computer without even knowing the secrets are there.

On the experiment webpage, a set of helpful tips appeared just below the video feed. Culled from government literature previously cited, tips included trying to relax or meditate; trying not to judge mental impressions that came; accepting that there were no right or wrong answers; writing down fleeting thoughts and images on paper; and, believing with complete surety that clairvoyance was real.

After focusing on a round's target, subjects were asked to answer two questions using free-form text. The first question ("What psychic impressions did you receive — what did you feel, see, or sense?") served to capture general impressions, mirroring how a test monitor might collect information that initially seemed unrelated to a target, but later turned out to be important. The second question ("What do you think the target is?") gathered a subject's actual attempt to identify a target.

After supplying free-form answers, subjects could submit any pictures they drew. This step was optional, and subjects could submit their images via email, by direct uploads to the website, or by SMS text message.

Mock Live Feed, Beacons, Dimmed Screens, and Cardboard Shields

The purpose of the video feed was to give subjects a real-time mental connection to the laptop, like the beacons used in U.S. government experiments. This "signal boosting" has precedents in other paranormal practices; in sympathetic magic, for example, a person's belongings, fingernails, or hair might be used to help "aim" magical spells at that person (Fortune). I therefore theorized that providing an image of the laptop in situ might help viewers ride their "psychic rails" to the machine more easily.

However, allowing subjects to see actual live video of the laptop posed challenges. Take the case where the laptop displays a target, but with the screen angled so its contents are not visible when looking at the live feed of the laptop on the experiment website. A talented clairvoyant might still be able to see the target optically if they could psychically enter the closet at an angle directly in front of the laptop's screen. Even dull light casting or being reflected from a laptop's screen might carry information readable to a skilled remote viewer (Backes, et al.), like how researchers have been able to read data purely from radiation emanating from computer monitors (Elibol, et al.). Showing targets that would be plainly visibly on a computer screen seemed risky, since a subject who scored a direct hit would only prove that remote viewing was possible from challenging angles, but not that remote viewers could see data inside the computer.

To solve this challenge, I employed a mock live video feed. Subjects were shown what appeared to be a live feed of the target laptop in the closet, but the feed was really a still-image doctored to look like it was coming from a live video camera, complete with the current day's date stamp and the word "LIVE" printed on it, as shown earlier in Figure 3. The still image was served up from a web server sitting next to the target laptop's closet. The web server was connected to the Internet via a cable to provide a physical connection between the subject and the closet area, while allowing the target laptop to remain disconnected from all networks for security reasons. Further, although subjects were told that intended targets were stored on one target laptop, in truth there were two target laptops, with each containing its own unique, randomly chosen picture, PIN, passphrase, and video targets. Two laptops were used as a failsafe in case one laptop suffered a hardware failure during the experiment.

The left photo shows the two target laptops located in a Los Angeles closet. The tiger and parrot photos were taped to the closet walls to serve as psychic beacons for subjects to zero in on. The right photo is a close-up showing a laptop's screen, which displayed the picture target, the looping video clip target, and the desktop icons for the text files containing the ATM PIN number and passphrase targets.

Laptops 1 and 2 sat across from each other in the closet. Laptop 1 had a picture of a tiger taped to the wall above it, and a parrot picture was taped to the wall above laptop 2, with both animals serving as psychic beacons. When a subject arrived at the experiment website, the subject was randomly assigned to laptop 1 or 2 for the duration of the experiment, and shown the appropriate mock live feed (either laptop 1 with its tiger, or laptop 2 with its parrot). Each computer contained its own unique set of picture, PIN, passphrase, and video targets (i.e., the targets on laptop 1 were different from targets on laptop 2). Both laptops were stand-alone with networking disabled for security, and equipped with identical operating systems, software, and configurations.

To help ensure remote viewers accessed data inside the computers — rather than just reading the information from the laptops' screens — I obscured the screens before the experiment started. Each computer's screen was electronically dimmed to solid black until no information was visible to the naked eye and a light meter held up to the screen registered 0 Lux in the pitch-black closet. As an extra precaution, a makeshift cardboard "shield" was slid down over each computer's screen, covering the screen's front, back, top, and sides, and then black tape was applied where a shield met the computer's chassis so no errant light could escape.

This is what the two laptops actually looked like during the experiment. Before the study began, each laptop's screen was dimmed to total darkness, and then the front, sides, and back were covered by cardboard and black tape as an extra precaution to prevent any errant light from escaping.

Since the live feed presented to subjects was fake, I made sure to include a paragraph in the participant consent agreement stating that researchers reserved the right to present situations and targets that appeared real, but which were actually simulated.

Technology Details

The experiment website (psychicexperiment.org) and judging site (psychicexperiment.org/judging) were hosted in Google Cloud's App Engine environment. Server webpages were coded using HTML, CSS, Javascript, and PHP. Data was stored in a MySQL database in Google Cloud, with automatic failover, backups, and logging enabled. Access permissions only allowed database access from the experiment website and from my computing lab's network.

Subjects' approximate geolocations were calculated by Google from participants' Internet addresses, and verified using the MaxMind GeoIP2 Country Database service (www.maxmind.com). Time zone and geolocation data were approximate, but likely accurate enough to calculate rough geographic areas and time zones needed for time-based analyses discussed later (Gharaibeh, et al.).

Although the experiment website was hosted at Google, the mock video feed images shown to subjects like the one in Figure 3 were served from a web server in my computing lab so psychics would have a physical connection to the lab's Los Angeles location. Stated differently, when a subject looking at the experiment webpage was asked to focus on a target, the part of the webpage showing the target laptop was actually transmitted from the lab web server, which sat just 10 feet from the closet housing the target laptops. The web server was connected by cable to the Internet via a firewalled DSL router, which resolved to web address secrets.psiresearch.net.

The computing lab contained two additional computers. A "control computer" was used to create and organize psychic targets until they were ready to be used. This laptop was stand-alone, with networking disabled for security. Target files were randomly selected on the control computer, and then transferred to the two target laptops via a USB drive nightly at midnight. Next, an iMac "management workstation" managed the experiment. Scripts on the workstation ran to update the web server's network address, and perform backups. The workstation also offered a control panel for performing management functions, and provided remote access into the experiment database in Google Cloud.

The closet was also equipped with a Geiger counter, electromagnetic field (EMF) meter, and a temperature gauge. These components can be seen sitting on the table between the two laptops in Figure 4. The devices were present to capture any potential environmental effects occurring during periods of psychic activity, but no unusual activity was detected.

See Appendix M for the hardware and software used in the experiment.

Experiment Constraints

In the experiment design, I adopted constraints to help demonstrate that remote viewers really had accessed data in a computer, rather than accessing the data some other way. I also devised a way to install new targets onto the target laptops that would ensure the experiment remained double-blind. See Appendix C for the full list of constraints.

Physical and Cyber Security

Physical security controls protected the experiment equipment. The door of the closet housing the laptops remained closed except when new targets were installed. A Ring-brand security video camera with night vision and real-time alerting sat inside of the closet to record anyone who opened the closet door, and footage was reviewed daily. The control computer, web server, and workstation were all located in the lab, which was protected by a professionally monitored alarm system. The control computer that controlled the targets, and the USB drive used to transfer targets between computers, were stored in a locked safe when not in use.

Cybersecurity defenses also protected experiment data. Computers were hardened against cyberattacks and hacking, with fully patched operating systems, password protection, anti-malware software running, all unnecessary ports closed, restrictive file permissions, and logging enabled, and only I knew the systems' login passwords. The control and target laptops were stand-alone, with networking capabilities disabled. The web server and workstation computers were connected to the Internet by copper RJ-45 cabling to an AT&T DSL router with an integrated firewall, and traffic between these computers and the experiment website was protected by Transport Layer Security (TLS), a common encryption scheme used by banks on the Internet (Hiltgen, et al.). When not actively in use, the psychic target files were encrypted at rest using AES-256, a well-known and trusted encryption algorithm to guard against snooping (Selvaraju and Sekar).

Other defenses are summarized in Appendix C. Appendix M lists the experiment's hardware and software used.

Target Creation, Selection, and Deployment

The four targets (pictures, ATM PINs, passphrases, and video clips) were managed using the control computer mentioned earlier. Targets were given randomized filenames that offered no hints about target files' contents, and stored in an encrypted format using AES-256. Targets were hand-carried from the control computer to the target laptops using a USB flash drive whose contents were overwritten and then deleted after each deployment. I had no knowledge of which targets were deployed, thanks to randomized filenames, automated scripts that did not require human interaction, and cardboard shields installed over the target laptops' dimmed screens.

Each picture target was chosen at random from a pool of 75 possible pictures collected from a variety of sources, including social media sites, online image libraries, random image searches, books I own, and candid cellphone photos taken around Los Angeles three months prior to the experiment's start. Pictures were selected only if they had vibrant, geometric, strange, surprising, mysterious, funny, emotionally charged, or similar content, since memorable images have been known to be stronger attractors for remote viewers than bland images (Delanoy 233-241).

After the experiment ended, the images were organized into a database, where they were categorized according to their content, so judges would not be exposed to too many of the same kind of image when trying to determine which image in a set was the actual target. The image categories included Abstract (geometric patterns in art, cities, etc.), Action (people doing things actively), Animals, Architecture, Humans (portraits and candid photos), and Nature. All pictures were stored as .jpg files for consistency, and a picture chosen as a target was only used once.

Each ATM PIN number was generated randomly minutes before being deployed, and stored in a plain text file. An ATM PIN could contain any digits zero through nine.

Like PINs, each multi-word passphrase target was generated randomly minutes before being deployed. A passphrase is a password made up of random words combined in nonsensical ways that is easier to remember than purely random letters and numbers. A sample 25-character passphrase might be, "SPACE HORSE JUGGLES TREES," and because it is so long, it can resist brute force guessing; a 25-character passphrase allowing only uppercase letters and spaces has  $27^{25}$  (608 decillion) different variations.

To generate a given passphrase, four text files were created named adj.txt (containing 57 adjectives), colors.txt (containing 11 color names), nouns.txt (132 singular nouns), and verbs.txt (100 present-tense verbs). The files were fed to a custom program that picked one word randomly from each file, and in random order (e.g., SAD BLUE WHALE SWIMS, BLUE SAD SWIMS WHALE, etc.). The program then saved the completed passphrase into a plain text file to be deployed.

Passphrase word lists were carefully curated, since past research shows clairvoyants may have more success with targets that are emotive, active, and/or meaningful (Delanoy 233-241).

Therefore, evocative adjectives, verbs, and colors were used, along with highly symbolic nouns appearing often in mythology (e.g., god, man, star, etc.). Since the four word parts could be taken in any order, there were 8,276,400 possible passphrase combinations (assuming syntax did not matter), and 198,633,600 possible passphrase permutations (assuming a psychic could zero in on not just words, but word order).

The fourth and final target was a video clip chosen randomly from a pool of 10 video clips. The various clips ranged from 3 to 21 seconds; each was made to loop repeatedly on a target laptop's screen; and, all were stored in MPEG-4 format for consistency. The clips were collected from a variety of sources, and edited down in duration two months before the experiment started. As with the other targets, video passages were chosen that had strong visual, action, or emotional content.

For technical details on how randomness was used in generating and selecting targets, see Appendix K.

Experiment Judging and Scoring

Overview of the Judging and Scoring Process

Experiment submissions were eligible for judging and scoring if received before the experiment closed its doors to the public on November 6, 2022.

In the first of two judging phases, submissions were scored by 6 volunteer judges that included a skeptic, a stage magician, and a medium. See Appendix G for a list of all judges.

The 6 judges could encounter picture, video, ATM PIN, or video rounds presented in random order, meaning the next round presented to a judge could be any kind of round from any experiment participant.

Judging took place via a secure webpage (www.psychicexperiment.org/judging).

Displayed at the top of the webpage was a randomly chosen subject's submission. The submission included the subject's psychic impressions, the subject's guess about the target's identity, and any drawings the subject submitted. Below these, a judge was presented with a set of five possible psychic targets in random order. The set included the actual target, plus four decoy targets that looked just as likely to be actual targets. Buttons beside each possible target allowed a judge to choose whichever target matched a subject's submission best, then second best, etc. Beneath these, judges were asked to choose a confidence level of High, Medium, or Low, indicating their confidence in their first-place pick. High confidence indicated a very strong match of multiple details, Medium indicated a partial match of at least one detail, and Low indicated that a match was unlikely.

One of the judging pages is shown above. Judges saw a subject's impressions and official guess, plus any drawings submitted, and below those, 5 potential targets that the judge would rank. Targets included the real target, plus 4 decoys, all in random order. The judge would also indicate whether their first-place selection was of High, Medium, or Low confidence. In this example, the judge is judging an ATM PIN submission.

Video rounds were a special case. Participants were unaware of the looping video present on the laptop's screen, so they did not have a chance to target it intentionally, or submit guesses about its content. So, when asked to score a video round, a judge would be asked to compare a still from the video clip to the subject's picture round submission, with the idea being that both video and picture rounds are pictorial in nature; that is, while trying to target a picture target, a subject might have picked up on details from the looping video instead, and included those details in their picture round guess. This meant judges could see a subject's picture submission twice: once when judging the picture round, and again when judging the video round.

If a submission's actual target was chosen as the first-place pick by at least two judges, the submission was considered a potential psychic hit, and it progressed to a second judging phase for deeper analysis.

Judges' Decoy Targets

The judges' decoy targets were created in the same way as actual targets to ensure all targets were indistinguishable in quality. The database of decoys included 813 decoy pictures; 813 randomly generated ATM PINs; and, 813 randomly generated, multi-word passphrases.

To help make psychic hits stand out more during judging, picture decoys were chosen that were dissimilar (orthogonal) to the target picture. Every actual and decoy picture target was assigned a subject category at creation time, which could be Human, Abstract, Architecture, Nature, Animal, and Action. Then, during picture rounds, a judge was shown the actual picture target, plus four randomly selected decoy images from categories different from the actual picture target's category. The purpose of this was to provide a varied selection of images to judges, rather than many pictures of the same kind, to help subjects' impressions stand out with greater resolution. For example, if a target was a horse in the Animal category, then the four decoys would be randomly chosen from non-Animal categories. This offered no hints to judges (since any decoy could just as easily be the real target in judges' minds), while eliminating scenarios where, say, a judge might be forced to compare a subject's guess of a horse against 5 different kinds of horses. This was a fair limitation, since this study was concerned with whether remote viewing into computer data was feasible at all, and not whether judges could describe minute variations among similar-looking targets.

Since there were a finite number of decoys available, decoys were not retired once used, so a judge could encounter a decoy more than once. This was deemed acceptable because there was only a small (4.35%) chance of a judge seeing the same decoy twice, since each judge was only asked to judge 200 rounds, and a given decoy would only appear in certain round types (a picture decoy would never appear in a words or numbers judging round, for example). To avoid confusing judges, judges were instructed to expect that some targets might be shown more than once, since targets shown during judging rounds were selected and shuffled randomly.

Judging Integrity

Steps were taken to protect judging integrity. Judging was double-blind for impartiality, and to reduce chances of outside psychics interfering with target selection telepathically. Judges did not know which targets were real, and which were decoys; in fact, judges were not informed that decoys were being used at all. Instead, judges were merely told to match subjects' submissions against the "best matching" targets. As far as judges knew, it was possible that multiple real targets were being shown in a given judging round (when in fact, only 1 real target was being shown alongside 4 decoys).

Decoys were created and randomly assigned to rounds after the experiment ended, but before judges were even chosen, to reduce the likelihood of psychic perturbation unfairly influencing decoy creation or selection. I also had no knowledge of which decoys were in play, since selection was automated without human involvement. Even image filenames were changed to randomized values (e.g., 'flower.jpg' might become 'jPsJue8nv4Q.jpg', etc.) so files' names could not betray clues about images' contents. Target and decoy assignments in the experiment database were also encoded so they were not human-readable.

Additional controls were used to help ensure judging integrity. Targets and decoys were shuffled into random order before being displayed to judges, so positions of targets shown on the judging website offered no clues about which target was real. Nobody was allowed to see subjects' submissions — except judges — until all judging was completed. Judges were not shown subjects' names, locations, or other identifying information. Each judge was assigned a unique set of login credentials to ensure scores could be attributed to a particular judge, and to prevent unauthorized access to the judging website. Judging and security activity were logged, and logs were inspected daily.

Emails were also used to prove data integrity. While the experiment ran, judges received an automated email nightly containing a log of that day's experiment activity. Each log contained a unique database record identifier for each new submission received, plus a "digital fingerprint" that served as an integrity snapshot of both a submission's content and its associated target, i.e.:  $\text{fingerprint}(\text{submission record identifier} + \text{submission content} + \text{target content})$ . This ensured that any unauthorized change of a submission or its target in the experiment database would be detectable, since the corresponding fingerprint would also change. Later, when the first three judges visited the judging website for the first time, each judge was asked to verify a fresh fingerprint (taken from a randomly chosen submission and its target) against the original fingerprints emailed to the judge earlier, to prove that no submissions or targets in the database had been altered or corrupted. The cryptographic hashing algorithm SHA1 was used to generate each fingerprint. SHA1 is effective as a data verifier because it is deterministic — every possible input theoretically produces a radically different output, so even the change of a single letter in a subject's submission would be evident (Merrill). A SHA1 hash output is also relatively short, being only 40 characters long, making it convenient for judges to manage when comparing hashes, as compared to other, more complex hashing algorithms. (I should add that the use of SHA1 has been deprecated in many circles, in part because in 2017, Google managed to find a "collision," which is a condition where two inputs yield the same hash output value, rendering the hashing algorithm potentially untrustworthy for certain uses. However, achieving this feat required over nine quintillion computations in lab conditions (Merrill). Thus, the chance of the fingerprint being the same for both a subject's submission, and a covertly altered version of that submission, is infinitesimally small to an acceptable degree).

Before judging began, each new judge also underwent a 15-minute training to help ensure judging consistency.

Winnowing the Submissions

Even though many people have some psychic ability, researchers conducting psychic experiments often work with subjects who have demonstrated psychic skills many times in the past (May, et al., ESP 129). This should be no surprise, since proving psychic functioning is difficult under even the best laboratory circumstances, so working with seasoned psychics may allow researchers to demonstrate psychic effects faster.

I emulated this approach using the two judging phases outlined in the Overview above. Since I did not have a stable of trusted psychics whom I had worked with for years, my strategy was to instead open the experiment to the public — attracting as many people as possible — and then use the first judging round to narrow down a subset of talented subjects to analyze in depth, just like other researchers in the past (Kruth 242).

The scoring rubric that determined which submissions would move to the next judging phase was established before the experiment began for consistency, and to ensure that promising-looking submissions were not being cherry-picked. Rubric details are presented below.

First Judging Phase

In the first judging phase, each subject's picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase submissions were judged by three volunteer judges. Each judge was asked to adjudicate at least 200 rounds, if their time as a volunteer allowed for it.

The task of judging all submissions was divided equally across three judging chairs. Three judges chosen at random from the judging pool were placed into the 3 chairs so a maximum of 3 judges were judging at any given time. When a judge reached their goal of judging 200 rounds, a new judge selected at random would take over the previous judge's chair until all rounds were judged.

Sum of Ranks was used for scoring in this phase, which is the method prescribed for free response psychic experiments (Utts, "Assessment" 29). In this method, a judge compares a submission against 5 possible targets, of which 1 is real and 4 are decoys. The judge ranks each target against the submission, assigning a 1 for the best match, a 2 for the second-best match, etc.

If a judge correctly matched a submission against an actual target (that is, the real target among the 5 possible targets was matched against the submission as the judge's first-place pick), then that submission was marked as a potential psychic hit.

Since each submission was judged by 3 judges, the judges' 3 scores needed to be combined. The number of judges' correct matches for a given submission were counted and summed, with the best possible combined score being 3 (all 3 judges successfully matched the submission against the actual target for a score of 1+1+1).

However, the statistical formulas used for calculating probabilities later expect Sum of Ranks to be reported with 1 being first place (as opposed to 3 being first place in the scoring method above where judges' scores have been summed). To solve this, I converted each combined judging score into a Sum of Ranks-compatible value by converting scores of 3, 2, and 1 (with 3 being first place) into scores of 1, 2, and 3, respectively (with 1 now being first place). A submission scoring 1 was a psychic hit (i.e., 3 judges correctly matching the submission against its target). A score of 2 meant 2 judges had correctly matched the target. A low score of 3, which was equivalent to chance, indicated only one judge had correctly matched the target.

A rubric determined which submissions would move to the second judging phase for detailed analysis. For picture, video, and passphrase rounds, a submission required a combined judges' score of 2 or greater to proceed, since any worse score was equivalent to chance. ATM PIN rounds were handled differently. I wanted the benefit of judges' subjective scores (since judges needed to examine submissions that often contained handwritten scribbles or multiple PIN guesses), yet PIN numbers were also objective: a guess's digits either matched a target's digits, or they did not. So, subjectivity and objectivity were combined: each ATM PIN submission with a combined judges' score of 2 or greater was inspected, and if the guess correctly matched at least 2 digits of the target in any order, then the submission was allowed to advance to the second judging phase.

Submissions failing to reach the second judging phase would not undergo detailed analysis. Instead, their judging scores were simply reported to the subjects as points of interest. Also, since subjects were participating in picture, video, PIN, and passphrase rounds, it was possible that a subject could have a submission of one kind successfully reach the second judging phase, while their other submissions did not.

Second Judging Phase: Detailed Matches

Each submission reaching the second judging phase was first compared against its target by painstakingly counting every detail in the submission that matched a corresponding detail in its target. Inspired by the Figures of Merit scoring method described earlier, "Detailed Match" scores would be used to demonstrate that judges' subjective scores were reasonable; evaluate psychic performance against factors such as survey results; and, break ties (if two submissions received equal scores from judges, Detailed Matches could break the tie by counting who matched the most concrete details).

A submission's Detailed Matches score was the sum of points accrued as follows, starting with picture and video submissions. Each detail in a submission was compared to the target. A detail that was considered a direct match — an exact color, word, image, or other descriptive match — received 1 point, while a detail that matched a target only abstractly received 0.5 points. For example, say a photo of a man falling off his bicycle and into a river was the target. A submission might receive 1 point for mentioning "water," 1 point for a mention of "falling," and 0.5 points for mentioning "two moving circles with spokes."

For ATM PIN rounds, each submission was compared against the round's target PIN number in two ways. First, the number of submission digits matching the target PIN's digits were counted, without regard for digit order. For example, if the target was 8765, a guess of 3256 would score 2, because 5 and 6 are both in the target; a guess of 7516 would score 3, because 7, 5, and 6 are all in the target. This was then repeated, but taking order into account. For example, if the target was again 8765, a guess of 2765 would score 3, because 765 is in the target in exact order, while a guess of 2675 would score zero, since none of the guess's digits are in the same order as the target's. Finally, if a submission contained more than one guess, the guess most resembling the target was selected as the answer, with the assumption that this was likely the guess that caused 2 or more judges to correctly match the submission against the target.

Passphrase rounds were scored like picture rounds. A submission scored 1 point for each exact color, word, or other descriptive match; 1 point when direct-match words were in the correct syntax order (e.g., BLUE SKY instead of SKY BLUE); and, 0.5 points for each abstract match. For instance, if the random passphrase target was CHURCH ALERT WEEPS YELLOW, a guess of "church" or "weeping" would score 1, while guesses like "communal wine" or "holy" would score 0.5.

Detailed Matches were scored by judge #102, who was chosen randomly from the six judges.

Once detail matching was finished, submissions were sorted into order of apparent psychic power. Picture, video, and passphrase submissions were first sorted in ascending order by judges' scores, and then sub-sorted in descending order by Detailed Matches to break ties where possible. PIN rounds were sorted by 3-digit matches observed in exact order, then by 3-digit matches in any order, then by 2-digit matches in exact order, then by 2-digit matches in any order, without regard for judges' subjective scores at this late stage.

Comparative and statistical analyses were performed last. These included comparing psychic performance against survey answers; evaluating judges' accuracy; investigating whether a subject had inadvertently described unintended targets; and, calculating probabilities of psychic hits observed to determine if rejecting the null hypothesis was warranted.

Statistical Methods

P-values for one-tailed tests were calculated with an alpha level of  $p=.05$ , which is a common threshold used in Parapsychology (Utts, "Successful"). P-value expresses "the probability that our test statistic could be as extreme as it is, or more so, if we assume that the null hypothesis is true" (Utts and Heckard 467). In our case, if a round's p-value is less than 0.05, then the null hypothesis (i.e., effects observed are simply chance) is rejected in favor of our one-sided alternative hypothesis (i.e., effects observed are not chance). Conversely, if the p-value is greater than 0.05, then we failed to disprove the null hypothesis (Utts and Heckard 467-468). Note that p-value should not be considered absolute proof for either the null or alternative hypothesis; it is instead a relative gauge of how well a data set fits with its computational model (Greenland, et al.), which is to say that while this study demonstrates psychic functioning under certain conditions, I cannot claim that psychic hacking can be expected to function reliably under every condition.

For picture, video, and passphrase rounds, both Sum of Ranks and Direct Hits were used to calculate p-values. Since opinions vary in literature regarding how best to mathematically evaluate psychic experiments, using more than one statistical index is recommended (Hansen and Utts). P-value lookup tables combining Sum of Ranks and Direct Hits were generated using a computer program written by Hansen and Utts. The original program, whose Applesoft BASIC source code was published in 1987, would have taken many hours to generate each table needed while running on a computer processor of that era. Today's CPUs are much faster. I translated the Applesoft BASIC code into PureBasic, a more modern programming language (Fantaisie Software), which generated each necessary table in less than a second on a Mac computer (OS X 11.7, 4Ghz Intel Quad-Core i7, 16GB RAM). My PureBasic source code can be found in Appendix D.

For ATM PIN rounds, probabilities and corresponding p-values were obtained through direct calculation by how closely a guess matched its numeric target. Random chance ratios (the probability of hitting 2 or 3 correct digits in a PIN ranging between 0000 and 9999) were calculated by counting the number of ways that a guess could occur, while using combinatorics to take into account occurrences of double and triple digits (e.g., 4499, 4449, etc.). P-values were calculated from Z-scores using Wolfram Alpha (Wolfram Alpha).

For all rounds, Z-scores were calculated using the standard Z-test for a one-population proportion, i.e.:

$$z^* = \frac{\hat{p} - p_0}{\sqrt{\frac{p_0(1 - p_0)}{n}}}$$

where  $\hat{p}$  is the observed sample proportion,  $p_0$  is the hypothesized population proportion, and  $n$  is the sample size (Pennsylvania State University).

Effect sizes were also calculated to provide a standardized means of comparing different kinds of psychic rounds, and to show whether the psychic outcomes would be obvious to an observer, which is a clearer way of expressing psychic effects than relying on p-values alone

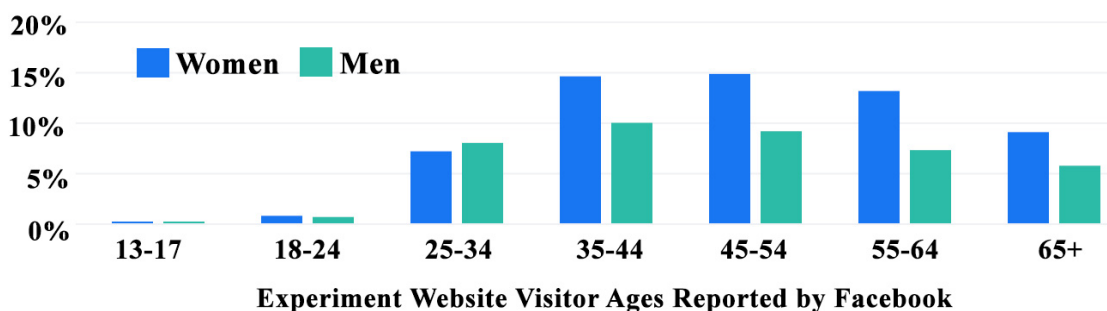

(Utts and Heckard 541). The standard effect size formula was used, where the  $Z$ -score is "divided by the square root of the number of trials in the study" (May, et al., Meta-Analysis 4), and with effect sizes being Small ( $\leq 0.2$ ), Medium ( $\leq 0.8$ ), or Large ( $> 0.8$ ) (Utts, "Assessment" 30).

Shannon's  $S$ -values were also calculated to provide another intuitive basis of comparison. Named after information theorist Claude Shannon, and calculated using the formula  $-\log_2(\text{p-value})$ ,  $S$ -values are based on the idea that rare events are surprising, and such events tend to carry more information than common events (Mansournia, et al.; Cole, et al.).  $S$ -values can be expressed as coin flips, where a given  $p$ -value is said to be comparable to witnessing a certain number of coin flips in a row that produce a consecutive run of heads, using an unbiased coin (Cole, et al.). The  $S$ -value for an observed  $p$ -value of 0.05 would equal 4.32193 bits of information against the null hypothesis, for example, which would be like getting heads on 4 consecutive coin tosses with an unbiased coin. An observed  $p$ -value of 0.0004 would be like witnessing 11 consecutive heads, which is more surprising.

Findings

Participant Engagement

146 participants completed the study, which ran from October 23, 2022 through November 6, 2022. Thanks to promotional advertising, the experiment attracted subjects from 107 cities in 10 countries, as shown in Appendix E. Although the study did not collect gender or age information directly from subjects for privacy reasons, anonymized demographics collected from Facebook ads that routed subjects to the experiment website show 59.4% of visitors were women, and 74% were between 35 and 64 years old (Facebook).

Most visitors were routed to the experiment website via ads placed on Facebook. These numbers show that most participants were female and between the ages of 35 and 64 (Facebook).

First names and email addresses were collected so participants could receive emails about the experiment. All such personal data was encrypted in the study database for privacy. To enforce anonymity for computing and database operations, each subject was identified only by number. See Appendix E for the list of identification numbers.

The time subjects spent participating in the experiment was consistent. 88% of subjects finished in under an hour, with the average person taking 27 minutes to complete the survey and all experiments. 5 subjects took more than 24 hours to complete the study, and the longest took 8 days. Appendix F presents the timestamps collected during the subjects' experiment rounds.

Content and quality of subjects' submissions varied. All subjects who completed the experiment successfully submitted some kind of text for all experiment rounds, and 22% submitted a picture. 14% of participants submitted at least one "I don't know," "Not sure," or similar to indicate they were not sure how to proceed at points in the experiment, or that they were having trouble receiving psychic signals. Subject #94 was reluctant to answer questions at all, believing participants were being duped into using psychic power to hack actual victims. Finally, a small percentage of subjects submitted frivolous answers, which were quickly scored low by judges.

Subjects were randomly assigned to either of the two target laptops, with each laptop containing its own unique set of picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets. 76 participants were sent to laptop #1 (which had the tiger taped to the wall above it), and 70 were sent to laptop #2 (which had the parrot above it).

About 13% of participants found the tiger and parrot pictures distracting. While these pictures were intended to serve as psychic beacons, some participants wrote that the pictures made it hard to focus on anything else.

As promised, all subjects were emailed their individual experiment results, and 3 participants were randomly chosen to win Amazon gift cards on December 15, 2022. The winning subjects' IDs were 76, 113, and 132.

Survey Results

All 146 participants completed the survey, which required an average of 6.5 minutes to finish.

The first four questions, which were mandatory and explored subjects' beliefs and experiences, found that 87% of subjects believed that some people have psychic abilities. 42% of participants admitted to having psychic abilities themselves, while another 50% were not as sure, but believed some of their past experiences might have been paranormal. Among the self-identified psychics, 75% had psychic powers for 20 years or more, with 57% experiencing psychic abilities since childhood. Psychics experienced clairvoyance, precognition, and telepathy most often per year (68%, 53%, and 42%, respectively). Some psychics could activate paranormal powers on command: clairvoyance (35%), energy healing (25%), and telepathy (21%) were the most common, with mediumship (16%), ability to contact non-humans (angels, etc.) (16%), remote viewing (15%), precognition (12%), astral projection (8%), and psychometry (5%) being less common.

131 subjects answered the next optional questions, which explored the environments and practices that help some participants have successful psychic experiences. Being in a quiet environment (63%), lying down or reclining (66%), and being relaxed (49%) were considered important. Preference for time of day varied among morning (29%), evening (23%), and dead of night (23%). The most important practices (rated as "helps often" or "I require it") included focusing intention (41%), meditation (40%), and shutting eyes or wearing a blindfold (27%). Second-most important practices (rated as "helps sometimes") included using crystals (33%), rhythmic noises (drumming, etc.) (28%), burning incense (27%), prayer (24%), magical or religious rituals (23%), distracting oneself by doing other things (23%), or being in water (18%).

A summary of the survey results can be found in Appendix J1, and raw survey data is captured in Appendix L1.

Judging Results

1,752 rounds needed to be judged in the first judging phase, since the 146 participants each generated 4 rounds (picture, video, PIN, and passphrase), and each of these needed judging by 3 judges. The 1,752 rounds were divided equally among the 3 judging chairs, with each chair assigned 584 rounds to judge. The 6 judges rotated randomly through the chairs such that 3 chairs were judging at any given time, with the average judge evaluating 292 rounds. The exception to this was judge chair number 2: the first judge assigned to this chair (judge #102) volunteered to judge all 584 rounds for the chair, meaning the other 5 volunteers rotated through chairs 1 and 3. See Appendix G for a description of the judges.

The three judges chosen to certify data integrity completed their tasks successfully. Before they were allowed to judge rounds, each judge was given a fresh SHA1 digital fingerprint of a randomly chosen submission, and then asked to compare the freshly computed fingerprint to the original fingerprint the judge received by email while the experiment was ongoing. As shown below, all three judges pledged that their new hashes matched the hashes they received earlier, indicating submissions stored in the database had not been altered or corrupted from the moment subjects submitted their data, to the point when judging began.

Table 1. Judges' certifying digital fingerprints

Fresh digital fingerprints (SHA1 hashes) were taken of 3 randomly chosen experiment records. At the start of judging, certifying judges compared the fresh fingerprints against the hashes they received in their daily logs during the experiment. The "Certification Received" column indicates the date and time when the hashes were certified as matching, an indication that subjects' submissions stored in the database did not change between being received from subjects and the start of judging.

On average, judges picked the actual target as their first-place choice 18.43% of the time, and matched submissions to decoy targets the rest of the time, as shown in Table 2 below. The judge in chair 2 had the strongest hit rate, with accuracy of 21.58%. Given that judges were picking a target from 5 options (1 target + 4 decoys, or 1/5), 21.58% is slightly better than outcomes expected by random guessing.

Table 2. Judges' confidence vs. accuracy

A comparison of Average Confidence versus % Correct shows that judges with the highest confidence were not the most accurate when trying to pick actual targets that were intermixed with decoys.

Table 2 above also shows that judges with high confidence in their first-place picks were not necessarily most accurate. Recalling that Confidence scores could range from 1 (Low Confidence) to 3 (High Confidence), average confidence across all judges was 1.42. The three most confident judges had scores of 1.47, 1.48, and 1.48, but these judges were the 3rd, 4th, and 5th most accurate in correctly choosing the real targets.

Table 3 below shows submissions scored highest by judges mostly correlated with the highest number of Detailed Matches counted. For example, the 12 first-place picture submissions (i.e., picture submissions correctly chosen as the first-place pick by 3 judges) correspondingly had the highest number of Detailed Matches (43 details total). Likewise, the 11 second-place picture submissions (picture submissions correctly chosen as the first-place pick by 2 judges) had the second-highest number of Detailed Matches identified (14 details total). This correlation, which can be seen across the video and ATM PIN rounds as well, suggests judges were accurately catching details in submissions that were strong. (The correlation did not hold for passphrase rounds, but this was expected, since passphrase performance yielded the fewest hits overall, making it difficult to draw clear conclusions about judging and matching trends).

	1st Place		2nd Place
	# of Submissions Judged as 1st	# of Detailed Matches	# of Submissions Judged as 2nd	# of Detailed Matches
Pictures	12	43	11	14
Videos	10	27.5	8	2.5
ATM PINs	23	56	9	18
Passphrases	5	3	14	3.5

Table 3. Test of judges' accuracy

Judges' submissions ranked as 1st and 2nd place largely correlated with the number of matches enumerated during detailed examination of the scored submissions, suggesting judges were quite accurate, especially given that these strong results were obtained during an exhausting 1,752 rounds of judging.

As noted earlier, only submissions meeting the pre-established rubric progressed to the second phase of judging. A score of 2 or better was required for picture, video, and passphrase rounds, and matching at least 2 numbers in any order was needed for PIN rounds. 92 submissions met these criteria, including 23 picture, 18 video, 32 PIN, and 19 passphrase submissions. Analyses for these results are presented in sections that follow.

Picture Results

Of the 23 picture submissions scoring 2 or better, 82% had a Detailed Matches score of 0.5 or greater, with the strongest 5 submissions scoring 7, 6, 5.5, 4, and 4 matches, respectively.

The 23 picture submissions had a Sum of Ranks of 34, with 12 submissions scoring as psychic hits, meaning 3 independent judges matched each of these submissions correctly against their actual targets and in first place. These results were statistically significant, with a p-value of 0.000597 ( $\alpha=0.05$ ) calculated using the PureBasic program described in "Statistical Methods" earlier. Effect Size was 1.075 ( $Z = -4.5$ ), which is considered a Large effect. Shannon's S-value was 10.7, which means the probability of seeing 12 hits would be about on par with flipping a fair coin 11 times and getting all heads in a row. A complete summary of the high-scoring picture results can be found in Appendix J2.

As shown in Table 4 below, 4 targets yielded the highest number of hits, and the highest number of Detailed Matches. These pictures included a cathedral dome, a cemetery, a forest path, and a river depth gauge.

Target Picture	Total # of Submissions that Targeted this Target	# of Submissions Ranked as Hits	# of Detailed Matches Identified
 Cathedral dome	6	2	13
 Cemetery	9	2	9.5
 Forest path	3	2	6
 River depth gauge	3	2	5.5

Table 4. Targets with more hits, though shown less often

These 4 targets attracted the highest number of hits, even though other picture targets were presented far more often. This may suggest that certain kinds of content — geometric patterns or natural scenes as seen here, for example — may be more attractive somehow to clairvoyants.

Of note is that these 4 popular targets were the most successful in the picture rounds, even though other picture targets were shown to more subjects. For example, 12 subjects had this picture of a doe as their target, yet none of their submissions were scored as hits:

This target received no scored hits, despite being presented to far more subjects than the high-scoring, rarely seen targets in Table 4. Whether certain kinds of content are more difficult for remote viewers to target may be a valuable subject for future research.

Submissions ranked as hits could be surprisingly accurate. Subject #43 described the cathedral dome target as having colors of lilac and "blue, green, and beige" with a feeling of "sandstone" and "open air" in a "circular shape" with "vertical lines or protrusions around it." The subject's drawing shown in Figure 9 below resembled the cathedral dome's lines, circular shape, and repeating motifs. The strong degree of similarity is considered a "direct hit" in Parapsychology literature (Hardy, et al. 28), and is arguably more detailed than the U.S. government's example shown earlier in Figure 1.

Subject #43's drawing captures the circular shapes, arches, rectangles, and linear protrusions of the cathedral dome target.

In another example, Subject #12 described a forest path target as "quiet" with "sunlight" falling on a "forest path," and the path in the subject's drawing curves left like the target's:

Subject #12 captured the target's sunlit path, which similarly curves left through heavy forest.

Certain classes of pictorial targets yielded the highest submission scores. Looking at the numbers of details matched for submissions reaching the second judging round, pictures with strong geometric imagery (the cathedral dome, river gauge, and a collection of streetlamps) had 23 details matched among them. Nature scenes (the cemetery, forest path, and a spiraling green labyrinth) were in second place with 17.5 matches. Scenes of humans in peril (a falling bicyclist, a man tied up on the floor, and soldiers in war) scored third with 11.5 matches.

Video Results

For video rounds, judges compared a still frame from each round's video clip against the picture submission received from each subject, with the theory being that a subject targeting a picture target might have inadvertently targeted the video clip instead, since both were pictorial. This approach yielded positive results, with judges scoring 18 of the picture submissions as hits when comparing them against video stills.

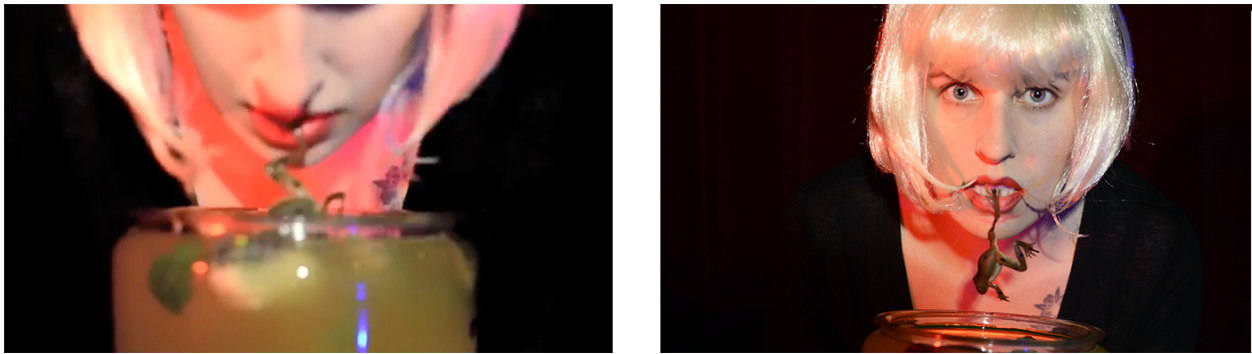

A Detailed Matches analysis was performed next, which identified video details in 11 of the 18 picture submissions. The strongest 5 submissions scored 5.5, 4, 4, 3, and 2.5 matches, respectively.

The highest-scoring video submission was from Subject #141. The subject matched 5.5 target details, described a clown face and "chattering wind-up toy teeth," and included a drawing of a wind-up teeth toy like the one in Figure 11. Such toys typically have white teeth and red lips. The target video clip assigned to Subject #141 was of a woman playing the part of a surreal clown who uses her teeth to pull a fake frog out of a swirling vat of liquid. The woman is wearing pale makeup and a wig, and she does flash red lips and white teeth — but the flash can only be seen in the original video footage that comes seconds after the clip chosen as the video target, as shown in Figure 12 below. In other words, the submission's mention of the toy, with its red lips and white teeth, seems to describe a moment that exists in the original, unedited video footage, but not in the short clip used in the experiment.

On the left is a still frame taken from the target video clip used in the experiment. No teeth are visible in the clip. On the right is a still frame taken from the original video footage, which was not included in the target video clip. Here, teeth are visible in the original footage similar to what Subject #141 described.

Figure 13 below shows matched details in Subject #141's submitted drawing were specific, capturing elements from the original footage. Numbered details captured by the drawing include:

1. Arched eyeline or brow
2. Defined cleft below nose
3. Overall "clown" or character appearance and active mouth
4. White teeth and red lips, like a wind-up chattering teeth toy
5. Crocodile and frog (both green, wet, semi-aquatic)
6. Water / liquid

The numbered markings indicate similarities between the submitted drawing on the left, and the still frame from the original footage on the right.

Subject #144 likewise captured details associated with, but not present in, the subject's assigned video clip. The target clip for Subject #144 was a suspenseful scene from The Shining, a horror film. In the clip, a troubled writer tries to break through a hotel bathroom door with an axe. Subject #144 sensed a "heartbeat" and "blood." Indeed, The Shining employs a heartbeat sound effect at various points in the film to suggest that the hotel itself is alive, and there is a scene where a hotel hallway fills with blood (The Shining), yet neither the heartbeat effect nor the blood scene were present in the footage used in the experiment video clip.

Based on judges' scores, 10 video submissions were psychic hits, with a Sum of Ranks of 26. These results were statistically significant, with a p-value of 0.000911 ( $\alpha=0.05$ ) as calculated using the PureBasic program. Effect Size was 1.131 ( $Z = -4.58$ ), which is a Large effect. The S-value was 10.1, meaning seeing 10 hits would be like observing fair coin flips that produce 10 heads in a row. A summary of the high-scoring video results can be found in Appendix J3.

As with the picture results, certain classes of video targets attracted more matching details than others. Geometric imagery (curves, zigzags, etc.) was strongest, with a combined count of 11 details matched. In second place with 10.5 detailed matches were scenes of humans in peril (the bathroom door scene from The Shining, and a scene of Mr. Gatsby yelling from the 2013 film, The Great Gatsby). Nature scenes were in third place with 8.5 matches, including the green hilltop scene from The Sound of Music.

See Appendix L3 for video submission, target, and scoring raw data.

ATM PIN Results

32 ATM PIN submissions successfully matched 2 or more digits against their targets, with an average of 2.19 digits matched per submission. Results were:

- 1 submission matched 3 digits in exact order

- 1 submission matched 3 digits, with 1 in exact order, and 2 in any order
- 8 submissions matched 3 digits in any order
- 3 submissions matched 2 digits in exact order
- 19 submissions matched 2 digits in any order

3 of the 32 submissions included more than one PIN guess by a subject. To resolve these, each submission's guess that most closely resembled the target was selected as the official answer, with the assumption that this was likely the guess that caused 2 or more judges to correctly match the submission against the actual target. Acting as referee, judge 102 chose which of a subject's multiple PIN submissions was most like the target.

PIN results were divided into four groups for statistical analysis, with p-values obtained through direct calculation. Three groups were found to be statistically significant:

- One subject correctly guessed 3 digits in exact order, whose probability after accounting for duplicate digits and other combinatoric edge cases was unlikely at  $39/10^4$ . This result was significant, with a p-value of 0.006527. Effect Size of 0.439 was Medium, and the S-value was 7.26, which would be like witnessing 7 heads in a row during fair coin flips. However, since there was only one instance of this rare event, this result was ruled insufficient to reject the null hypothesis.
- 9 subjects successfully guessed 3 PIN digits in any order, with the likelihood of such hits being  $744/10^4$ . The results were significant (p-value =  $4.118 \times 10^{-6}$ ) with a Medium Effect Size (0.788) and a S-value of 17.89, which would be like witnessing all heads come up consecutively during 18 fair coin tosses.

- 19 subjects guessed 2 PIN digits in any order. Guessing two digits was more likely than previous cases ( $2592/10^4$ ), but because there were so many successes, the results were significant, with a p-value of  $7.84 \times 10^{-6}$ . The Effect Size of 0.763 was Medium, and the S-value was 16.96, which would be like witnessing about 17 heads in a row during fair coin flips.
- 4 subjects guessed 2 PIN digits in exact order, but the results were not significant (p-value = 0.1774).

I also discovered that if subjects who were assigned the same ATM PIN target had colluded by combining their guesses, the number of guessing rounds required to obtain all of the PIN's digits would have been reduced compared to chance guessing. Table 5 below shows that only two subjects per target needed to collude to produce all digits needed for targets 6491, 9547, 4211, and 7938. Even more efficiently, PINs 4211 and 7938 were each assigned to only 5 subjects, meaning as few as 2 out of 5 guesses per PIN were required to arrive at the correct PIN digits (albeit with digits not in exact order).

ATM PIN Target	Guess (Matching Digits in Bold)	Subject #
6-4-9-1	1-4-9-2	19
	6-9-1-0	21
9-5-4-7	7-3-9-4	117
	5-0-6-4	106
4-2-1-1	2-1-6-2	53
	4-6-4-1	50
7-9-3-8	8-7-6-9	118
	3-5-2-9	115

Table 5. Potential for collusion

This data shows that clairvoyant collusion could reduce the amount of brute force guessing needed to obtain a PIN. Subjects 19 and 21, for example, collectively obtained the target's digits (6-4-9-1).

See Appendix J4 for a summary of high-scoring ATM PIN results, and Appendix L4 for ATM PIN submission, target, and scoring raw data.

Passphrase Results

5 of the 19 passphrase results were scored as hits by judges, with Detailed Matching scores ranging between 1 and 0. Results were not found to be statistically significant, with a p-value of 0.327 obtained via the PureBasic program. However, some results were notable:

- Subject #69 correctly guessed the word "black" in the subject's target passphrase.
- Subject #6 received mental impressions of spirals, cyclones, swirling, and spinning.

While these did not match the subject's passphrase, they did appear to match the video target running on the screen at the time, which was a clip of Julie Andrews spinning and singing on green hills from the film The Sound of Music.

Still frame from Sound of Music video target showing Julie Andrews spinning, which Subject #6 may have inadvertently targeted during passphrase round (The Sound of Music).

- Subject #13 received impressions of a pyramid. This did not match the passphrase, but it did match the pyramids picture target that was on the screen at the time:

Pyramids on the screen that Subject #13 seemed to inadvertently sense while focusing on the passphrase round.

- Subject #38's passphrase guess was "bubble, bubble, toil and trouble," a chant similar to the spell spoken by witches in Shakespeare's Macbeth, whose text includes, "Double, double, toil and trouble . . . Fire burn and cauldron bubble . . . Eye of newt and toe of frog . . ." (Shakespeare). The chant (inspired by the subject's guess) did not match the passphrase, but it seemed to match the video target playing on the screen at the time, which was the clip previously shown in Figure 12 of the woman putting her lips into a jar of swirling, bubbling green potion (perhaps a witchy cauldron?) and then using her teeth to pull a fake frog out of the liquid by its toes.

A complete summary of the high-scoring passphrase results can be found in Appendix J5. For passphrase submission, target, and scoring raw data, see Appendix L5.

Belief and Psychic Performance

Detailed Matches were compared against results from the survey question that asked subjects if they believed that they had psychic powers. In response to the question, "Do you have psychic abilities?" subjects could answer "Yes," "Maybe," or "No." The number of details matched in the picture, video, PIN, and passphrase rounds were placed into Yes, Maybe, and No buckets to determine which survey responses were associated with the highest number of details matched in submissions. Submissions associated with the survey answer of Yes had the most matches (93), followed by Maybe (70.5), and then No (7.5). In other words, submissions whose subjects believed they did (or could) have psychic powers ("Yes" or "Maybe") had 21.8 times more detailed matches than submissions whose subjects answered "No," as shown in Figure 16 below. To be fair, this study attracted a higher percentage of believers than non-believers; future research should retest these results against a more varied mix of believers and skeptics.

Subjects who believed they did (or might) have psychic ability (the blue and orange lines) matched far more details than participants who did not believe.

Time of Day

The 92 submissions reaching the second round of judging were analyzed to see if certain times of day were associated with better psychic performance.

First, submissions' time stamps were counted into 24-hour time buckets in subjects' local time zones. Then, the percentage of submissions per hour qualifying as potential psychic hits was calculated, with a hit defined as any picture, video, or passphrase submission with a Rank of Sums score of 1 (meaning 3 judges had correctly matched it in first place against the target), and for PINs, any submission that did better than matching 2 numbers in any order (which would include 2 numbers in exact order, 3 numbers in any order, and 3 numbers in exact order). As shown in Table 6 below, the highest percentages of hits occurred at 8 p.m. (75% hits out of 3 submissions), midnight (67% hits out of 3 submissions), 5 p.m. (60% hits out of 5 submissions), and 11 a.m. (60% hits out of 5 submissions). Since the highest number of submissions were received at noon (10 submissions) and 9 p.m. (10 submissions) — yet both of these had relatively low percentages of hits (40% and 30%, respectively) — higher numbers of submissions did not necessarily correlate with more hits.

Hour	# Submissions	# Hits	Hit %
0	3	2	67
2	0	0	0
3	0	0	0
4	2	0	0
5	1	0	0
6	2	1	50
8	2	1	50
9	4	2	50

19	4	1	25
20	4	3	75
21	10	3	30
22	5	2	40
23	4	1	25

Table 6. Most successful psychic times of day

The greatest number of hits arrived between 11 a.m. and midnight, but greater numbers of submissions did not necessarily equate to more hits; for example, 10 submissions at noon gave 4 hits, but only 7 submissions were needed to achieve 4 hits at 3 p.m. Subject talent and time of day may play more of a role than higher traffic.

Sidereal Time

High-scoring submissions were also compared to a time window that has been associated with enhanced psychic performance. A meta-analysis by Spottiswoode of 2,483 free-response ESP experiments found psychic ability can increase fourfold during a narrow window ranging from 12:45 to 14:15 in Local Sidereal Time (LST) (Spottiswoode). Popular in astronomy, LST keeps time relative to stars, rather than relative to the Sun, and the optimal time window discovered by Spottiswoode situates the Earth's core such that it temporarily blocks the galaxy's cosmic interference at a subject's location, reducing noise that might interfere with psychic power.

Examining Spottiswoode's optimal (but narrow) window, it became clear that it was part of a broader spectrum that grows in effect size from about 10 LST to its zenith at 13:47 LST, before descending to its nadir near 19:00 LST. I was therefore free to widen the window to analyze as many submissions as possible, provided I accepted that increased cosmic noise outside the original window may have degraded some subjects' psychic performance.

I widened the aperture to allow for submissions 90 minutes before and after Spottiswoode's narrow window, and calculated the sidereal times for the top-five-scoring picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase submissions that ranked as hits. 30% of these top 20 submissions fell within the expanded LST window, including the second-place submission in both the ATM PIN and passphrase categories. See Appendix H for detailed data.

Discussion

Selecting and Organizing Subjects

Involving the public in paranormal experiments is a promising strategy for identifying psychics capable of producing statistically significant results. 62% of experiment participants showed potential psychic power, based on judges' first round scores, supporting previously cited claims by Swann, Puthoff, and Targ that psychic ability can be found in many people. While some past experiments in literature preferred using experienced psychics, the opportunity to "crowd source" the Internet for latent psychic talent creates possibilities for conducting research involving the combined psychic power of thousands or even millions of people.

Choosing subjects who meet certain screening criteria could help experiments arrive at significant results more efficiently. Participants who believed they might be psychic had 21.8 times more matching details than subjects who believed they were not psychic. This finding aligns with cited conclusions by Lawrence that a belief in ability enhances psychic performance, and suggests that surveying subjects before an experiment to understand beliefs could highlight participants with highest psychic potential early. Subjects had the most hits between 11 a.m. and midnight in their local time zones, so picking subjects available to work during these times may be prudent. Choosing subjects able to operate near the psychic time window described by Spottiswoode — 12:45 to 14:15 in Local Sidereal Time (LST) — may improve performance even further, since 30% of this study's top-scoring performers (including two second-place finishers) fell within 90 minutes of this window.

Facebook's metrics showed most visitors directed to the website via social media ads were women aged 35 to 64. Since age and gender data were not available on a per-visitor basis for privacy reasons, I cannot say which population performed best. Future experiments may benefit from sorting strong psychic performers by demographic to see if certain combinations of age and gender produce stronger results for certain kinds of psychic phenomena. Taking into account how long subjects have self-identified as psychic, and which psychic abilities are most prevalent for a subject, could be additional dimensions to consider for future work.

On Judging

Based on results from 1,752 rounds of judging, and analysis of judges' accuracy and confidence levels, picking judges for an experiment who have middle-of-the-road confidence may provide highest accuracy. Judges' overall average confidence level was 1.43 out of a possible confidence high score of 3. The three judges with highest confidence were the 3rd, 4th, and 5th most accurate in correctly choosing the actual targets. Meanwhile, judge 102, whose accuracy was highest (correctly picking the actual target 21.58% of the time), had a confidence level of 1.46, which was closest to the average.

Judge 102's high accuracy may have stemmed not only from moderate confidence, but also from the fact that this judge chose to judge all 584 rounds for judging chair 2, while the other 5 judges spanning judging chairs 1 and 3 each judged an average of 234 rounds. Since every submission was judged by 3 judges, judge 102's accuracy was not due to somehow receiving an easier set of submissions and targets compared to other judges. It could be that this judge took more time to perform the judging; that judging a higher number of rounds made judge 102 more discerning over time; or, that judge 102 was especially skilled in eliminating decoys through logic or even a degree of psychic ability. These factors may be worth considering when selecting judges and planning experiments in the future.

As shown earlier in Table 3, there was a positive correlation between submissions scored as first and second place by judges, and the number of details matched for picture, video, and ATM PIN rounds. Submissions with the most details matched were also scored highest by judges, and submissions with the second-most matches were likewise scored in second place by judges. This suggests judges were discerning and accurate, at least when it came to correctly ranking submissions of strong psychic power.

Since judges' scores and details matched are correlated, the two judging rounds could be conducted in reverse order in future experiments to identify strong submissions faster through automation. Artificial Intelligence equipped with language and image recognition could first identify submissions containing high numbers of concrete matching details, and then the submissions with high scores could be submitted for manual rank-scoring by human judges. This might eliminate low-scoring submissions faster, and reduce numbers of rounds needing human judging.

Decoy Quality

Five of the six judges had an average accuracy rate of 18.43% when trying to identify actual targets shuffled among decoys. This performance was worse than random guessing (i.e., 1/5 or 20%), which suggests the decoys were convincing, with no obvious telltale signs that would make them stand out when compared to actual targets. This was the anticipated outcome, since targets and decoys were created using identical methods.

Importance of Choosing Strong Visual Targets

Of the six categories of visual targets available, Abstract, Nature, and Action targets yielded the highest submission scores. Summing the total number of detailed matches for both the picture and video rounds, targets with strong geometric imagery (lines, curves, zigzags) had 34 matches, followed by nature imagery with 26 matches, and finally, scenes of humans in peril, with 22 matches. Since geometric targets were significantly more successful than other categories, using picture or video targets with strong geometric elements in future experiments may yield more psychic hits than other imagery.

In other words, image content seemed to play a role in psychic efficacy, a finding supported by the frequency of targets rated as psychic hits. As Table 4 showed, certain targets received high numbers of Detailed Matches, even though other lower-scoring targets were shown to subjects more often. The cathedral dome was shown to just 6 subjects, yet received a detailed match score of 13, while the doe target was shown to 12 subjects and received no hits. By choosing targets that fall into strong visual categories when designing experiments, fewer experiment rounds may be needed to achieve statistical significance.

13% of participants found the tiger and parrot image "beacons" taped above the laptops to be visually distracting. Conversely, many participants had no trouble filtering these images out mentally. Whether or not the images helped psychic performance is thus inconclusive. Perhaps using abstract black and white images as beacons, rather than colorful animal faces, might prove less mentally intrusive to subjects sensitive to distractions.

Remote Viewing's Abstract Symbolism

I showed earlier that psychics' impressions can be symbolic, abstract, analogous, and even impressionistic, since remote viewers must interpret sensory information emanating from their unconscious minds, and examples of these were certainly present in submissions. During picture rounds, for example, Subject #65 described a dense cluster of gray streetlamps as "trunks of elephants" or "belts hanging on a hook." Subject #86 described a river gauge with its piano key markings as a "tool for rhythm on a piano." Subject #130, whose target was a desert ghost town, saw the "landscape of the Serengeti." For a target picture of gun-toting soldiers wearing helmets in a wartime trench, two subjects zeroed in on the helmet and gun shapes: Subject #69 mentioned "helmets" outright and described "cherries . . . joined by their stems," while Subject #64 similarly described seeing an "oval shape with two legs."

Subjects' psychic impressions can be abstract and impressionistic. Subject #65 described the gray streetlamps on the left as "trunks of elephants . . . or belts on a hook." For the soldiers on the right, two subjects picked up on the helmets and guns: Subject #69 mentioned helmets outright and described "cherries . . . joined by their stems," while Subject #64 saw an "oval shape with two legs."

The same effect was seen in a passphrase round where the target was CHURCH ALERT WEEPS YELLOW. Subject #23 described a banana (which is yellow) and a "voice in my head," which has metaphysical connotations (e.g., God speaking, etc.). Subject #18 described "fish" (a symbol for Jesus), SpongeBob SquarePants (a yellow character), and "Fish Fry Sunday," which is a common event at churches. Subject #16 described sensing a "feeling of reverence," "church wine," "bread communal," "a bearded friend," something "holy," and the name "John."

These examples underscore why imagination and analogous thinking are required when judging free response experiments.

Surprise Unintended Targets

While focusing on intended targets, some subjects inadvertently picked up on details of other targets that happened to be on the assigned laptop's screen at the same time. While focused on a passphrase target, Subject #6's impressions of spirals, swirling, and spinning did not match the passphrase, but did match the video clip of Julie Andrews spinning on green hills in the Sound of Music target video clip playing on-screen. During another passphrase round, Subject #13 sensed a pyramid, and while this did not match the target passphrase, it did match the Egyptian pyramid picture target that was on-screen at the same time.

Other subjects were able to describe not just targets, but also related tangential details that were not present in the experiment. Subject #144, whose video target was a clip from The Shining, sensed a "heartbeat" and "blood," and while neither of these were in the video clip used in the study, blood and a heartbeat both played important parts in the original film's footage, as discussed earlier in "Video Results."

Subject #137 also had The Shining video target, and managed to describe aspects of the story's context that were not included in the clip used in the experiment. In the original film, a family of three moves into an empty and isolated hotel for the winter in the snowy Colorado mountains. The father hopes to get some writing done when he's not busy working as the hotel's winter caretaker, and his wife and son are excited to be tagging along for a wintry vacation. In the clip used in the experiment, we see the mother hiding in a hotel bathroom while the mentally imbalanced father tries to break through the bathroom door with an axe. Even though no hints were given in the experiment's video clip about who the people were, or where they were located, Subject #137 correctly sensed that "someone's mother" was "on vacation" somewhere "in a mountain location."

In other examples, two subjects sensed tangential details related to the video clip of the woman using her teeth to pull a fake frog out of a jar of swirling, bubbling green liquid. As discussed earlier in "Video Results," Subject #141 sensed many of the video clip's details, including teeth. Teeth can be seen in the original, unedited footage of the woman, but they do not appear in the clip used in the experiment. Similarly, during their passphrase round, Subject #38 received an impression of "bubble, bubble, toil and trouble," which sounds like a match for "double, double, toil and trouble . . . cauldron bubble . . . toe of frog . . ." from Shakespeare's Macbeth. While the Macbeth quote did not match the target passphrase, it did seem to match the video target running at the time, which was of the woman and the frog. The Macbeth reference contains a direct mention of "frog," as well as of bubbling, and there is a moment in the original footage where the woman puts her lips into the green liquid glass jar "cauldron" and blows bubbles, although this footage never appeared in the clip used in the experiment.

These cases of sensing tangential data are reminiscent of the example given earlier from Puthoff and Targ (Perceptual 65), where a SRI psychic described details hidden behind a shrub that even the beacon researchers standing at the remote target site could not see. Psychics appear able to start with a target, and then clairvoyantly branch out to other ad hoc targets that are related tangentially, even if these tangents are not physically part of the original target.

A video still from original footage where the woman blows into the jar of green liquid, creating bubbles and churn among the green leaves and floating fake frogs. This portion of the footage was not included in the video clip used in the experiment, yet Subject #38 seemed to reference a Macbeth quote that mentions bubbling cauldrons and frogs. This unused footage was stored on a portable hard drive sitting in the computer lab 10 feet from the target laptops, and the drive remained disconnected and powered off throughout the experiment.

Potential Power of Collusion

While examining results, it became apparent that combining efforts of two or more psychics could produce accurate results faster than relying on a single clairvoyant, a result Puthoff and Targ also found (Puthoff and Targ, Perceptual 57). As shown in Table 5, combining guesses from two or more subjects yielded an ATM PIN's digits in as few as two guesses. As an example of a practical application, say a PIN number needed to be obtained by brute force guessing. Incorporating the digits divined from two psychics could reduce the number of guessing rounds required. Consider the PIN target 6491 shown in Table 5. If we combine subject 19's guessed digits (1-4-9-2) with subject 21's guessed digits (6-9-1-0), remove any duplicates, and brute force all 4-digit permutations of the remaining digits (0-1-2-4-6-9), we arrive at the PIN in a maximum of 360 tries, which is much faster than trying all PIN combinations from 0000 to 6491.

A similar situation was detected in picture rounds. Subject #90 described details about the bicyclist target that correctly included water, falling, and a crash. For the same target, Subject #83 sensed a "human head" that was "outdoors" and "looking to the left" — details which were also correct. Subject #85 also detected water, and drew bunny ears that were a similar match for the bicyclist's legs. The highest number of details achieved by any single subject was 3, but if we combine the results from all 3 subjects together, we arrive at 7 total details identified, which in aggregate make the bicyclist more readily identifiable than results from just one subject alone.

Convincing Evidence for Psychic Hacking

The Review of Literature showed computers were rarely psychic targets in the U.S. government's clandestine program, although they made incidental appearances occasionally either as objects clairvoyants sensed, or whose random number generation psychics tried to influence. The experiments closest to psychic hacking I found were cases where subjects tried to sense computers' internal states (the state of an oscillator, or of a digital coin flip, for instance). If we say "data" is factual, but "information" is the context and subjective interpretation of those facts (Goldschmidt and Lent, 182-183), then the government's experiments demonstrated psychics can receive information from computers, but stopped short of naming information's actual underlying data. By showing psychic hackers can go even deeper to retrieve data itself, this dissertation should be considered an extension of the U.S. government's psychic research.

As discussed earlier, the U.S. government's program had two standards for evaluating whether an experiment outcome was likely paranormal or chance. The first standard was simple observation and common sense according to principles of reasonable doubt, and the second standard was statistical.

This dissertation's experiment satisfied the first standard by demonstrating numerous "psychic hacking" effects that were plainly obvious to independent observers (i.e., the judges). Subjects described in writing and drawings copious details about randomly selected targets in computers — plus data tangentially related to targets, even though those tangents were not physically present during the experiment. Per the first standard, common sense dictates that the cause of the observed psychic effects was likely paranormal, since experiment controls effectively made other potential causes (e.g., peeking at targets) infeasible with practical certainty, which is the "highest level of certainty an individual can have in the absence of absolute certainty" (Chambers 662). Although Science cannot say how remote viewing works, a plain observer would likely agree that this experiment's outcomes are comparable to the U.S. government's own experiment results deemed paranormal by Utts and other experts in physics and statistics.

Applying the statistical standard next, experiment results were statistically significant, including results of the picture rounds ( $p=0.000597$ ), videos ( $p=0.000911$ ), and ATM PINs with 3 or 2 digits in any order ( $p=4.118 \times 10^{-6}$  and  $p=7.84 \times 10^{-6}$ , respectively). Based on these numbers, independent judging results, and detailed matches enumerated, statistics point to psychic hacking being a measurable phenomenon.

The picture and video results were arguably the most compelling evidence. After all, 4-digit ATM PIN numbers have only 10,000 possibilities, and passphrase construction has a limited number of English words to choose from, so the number of possibilities for these kinds of targets is finite. Imagistic targets, by contrast, could be pictures or videos of anything in the known universe, or in one's infinite imagination, or least it would seem so. Perhaps future research will discover that imagistic targets chosen really do follow previously undetected patterns, perhaps along the lines of Jungian archetypes (Jung).

Based on the low number of successes, passphrases were arguably the most difficult targets for both psychics and judges. Only 5 passphrase submissions were scored by judges as hits, and the maximum sum of details matched by the top-scoring submission was only 1. This means very few judges correctly matched passphrase submissions to targets, and those that were matched contained very few matching target details. After judging was finished, two judges commented that judging passphrases proved to be the most difficult of all the round types. Randomly selected words had to be analyzed individually and denotatively; potential connotative meanings suggested by the ordering of the words also had to be considered; and, if connotation was surreal or nonsensical, comparing abstract concepts to a psychic's submission required more concentration than looking at concrete ATM PIN numbers, or glancing at pictures.

Cybersecurity Implications

This experiment's outcomes pose potentially serious challenges to cybersecurity. Subjects were able to access data despite physical defenses, distances of hundreds or thousands of miles from targets, and controls that included hardened operating systems, disabled network access, and login passwords. Participants received no hints about targets' contents — and target computer screens were dimmed to black and covered with shields — yet subjects were still able to tease out unique details about pictures, videos, ATM PINs, and passphrases that were ranked as accurate by independent judges. Collusion among subjects could increase psychic hacking accuracy and speed even more than a single subject working alone, with each psychic contributing to part of the overall target puzzle.

Psychics described not only targets, but also adjacent targets; one subject targeted a passphrase, but inadvertently sensed details of a video clip playing on-screen at the time, for example. Psychics also picked up on tangential details about targets, even though those tangential details were not physically present during the experiment; when faced with video targets, some subjects described details about the original footage that the video clips had been taken from, but which had not been included in the experiment. These results seem to suggest that psychics can somehow follow quantum, thought, or other yet-to-be-discovered "tangent threads" linking targets to other information. A psychic who clairvoyantly "reads" a digital file on a computer might be able to then follow its "tangent thread" to related paper documents that are locked in a file cabinet in a distant office, for instance. This idea aligns with my earlier mention of Beloff (1978), who wrote that psi may operate according to purpose, rather than by a physical process. Perhaps this is how "following the tangent" works — if every set of data has an intrinsic purpose, and every purpose has a unique signature that psychics can sense, then it is only a matter of expanding the psychic search to find other unintended targets whose "purpose signature" are the same. This is how a psychic might start out by targeting data on a computer, but end up following purpose-signature tangents leading to a filing cabinet.

Psychics also succeeded even though the target data was stored in formats not readily readable by humans. The target data was stored on disks where bits may not have been in contiguous order that was intelligible; and, the data passing into and through the computers would have been in the form of electronic signals and binary encodings across complex software and hardware structures, including operating system layers, memory chips, wires, and CPUs. In Figure 19 below, the cathedral dome on the left is a .jpg image file that was one of the experiment picture targets used. When the .jpg file is opened and rendered by a computer for viewing, we see the recognizable picture of the dome. However, the hexadecimal numbers and letters on the right are raw data representing the dome inside of the .jpg file; when the .jpg file is rendered for viewing, the data on the right is what is read and decoded by the computer. Since subjects could not see the dome image visually, a question for future research is: Do clairvoyants "see" the dome in its fully rendered state somehow (even if computer screens are obscured), or are clairvoyants somehow decoding the raw hexadecimal .jpg data on the right? Regardless of the answer, we can conclude that obfuscating data through encodings and complexity is no defense against remote viewing.

The picture of the cathedral dome on the left is a .jpg image file, whose raw hexadecimal contents are shown on the right. How a psychic "sees" the cathedral image (either by seeing the image on the left directly, or by somehow decoding the data on the right) remains a mystery.

Based on this experiment's findings, many traditional cybersecurity defenses are rendered useless. Psychics can seemingly pass through vast distances and mediums without detection to hunt down data dispersed as electronic signals and binary in a computer, even if the computer is not connected to a network. Encryption may not be an effective defense, since psychics may be able to gather impressions of data the moment it is decrypted, or from data artifacts left over in memory from the decryption process. Hiding secrets amidst large volumes of data may be no defense either, since the laptops used in the experiment each contained gigabytes of operating system files, programs, and data on them, yet psychics were still successful at sniffing out targets.

Scariest still, psychics do not need to be given hints about targets. They can discover targets on their own — or inadvertent targets adjacent to intended targets — or details tangentially related to intended targets, even if those tangential details are not located anywhere nearby. These powers are akin to an actual hacker who gains unfettered physical access not just to a computer system, but to an entire office. I established that human-machine interfaces will soon allow digital data to traverse human brains. Since these systems are powered by computers, perhaps psychics could gain access to these also, riding the "electronic rails" directly into others' thoughts in a kind of "digital telepathy."

The experiment's results echo the 1992 caper film Sneakers, in which a ragtag team of security experts obtain a black box that can break into any computer in the world (Cryer). The team realizes how dangerous the box would be in the wrong hands, and clairvoyance that can also break into secured computers to retrieve secrets, bypassing all trusted defenses, should be considered equally alarming.

Fortunately, not all is bleak. First, if malevolent remote viewers can use their powers for espionage, perhaps other psychics could use their powers for protection. A psychic might detect if secrets have been breached, or sense the evil intensions of Artificial Intelligence (AI) gone rogue. Maybe psychics could even detect computer failures brewing in mission-critical medicine, energy, or air traffic control systems where human safety is paramount. Second, certain technologies may prove resistant to psychic breaches. Quantum networks have been shown to be generally impervious to eavesdropping, since any observation of quantum data effectively disrupts its superposition state (Saini and Shiwani). If this works in the physical world, perhaps it could work in the metaphysical world as well.

Future Research: Forever-Blind Targets Using Homomorphic Encryption

While analyzing the experiment data, it occurred to me that I could have used specialized encryption to keep all parties (including subjects, judges, and me) blind to ATM PIN targets permanently, reducing the chance of a telepathic subject sensing the targets in my mind, or of a subject precognitively foreseeing the targets published in this very paper in the future. If the encryption were implemented correctly, even a computer containing a target could be made blind to it, and even while the computer was busy comparing the target against a remote viewer's submission. See Appendix I for details on this scheme.

Conclusion

This dissertation began with me describing how my interests in clairvoyance and cybersecurity led me to extend the U.S. government's past remote viewing research from the 1970s and 1980s. My goal in this study was to establish whether "psychic hacking" was possible, that is, whether people with remote viewing powers can psychically retrieve and describe data present in computers.

I reviewed how the U.S. government's clandestine program proved that remote viewing is a real phenomenon, as determined by peer-reviewed, statistically significant results. Documented psychic spies described military installations and weaponry from thousands of miles away; tracked people psychically with real-time precision; and, even detailed features of the planet Jupiter that would be confirmed years later. Research also found that most people have some psychic powers; that training, belief in psychic ability, and following detailed research protocols are correlated with stronger psychic performance; and, that Sum of Ranks and counting matching details between a target and a subject's guess are effective for scoring remote viewing experiment results.

Yet, in the thousands of experiments the U.S. government conducted, hardly any were concerned with using computers as psychic targets. Computers — which could be challenging to obtain — were used in psychic research for data collection, recordkeeping, random number generation, and as tools to test precognitive and remote perturbation skills. However, searches of declassified government documents revealed no concerted effort to test whether psychics could describe data present in computers.

While there are many theories as to why remote viewing works, the task of accessing computer data psychically poses practical problems. Data in a computer is not located in a single form or location; it may be dispersed in bits across a fragmented disk, or exist as an electronic or binary stream across software structures, computer chips, wires, and polarizing surfaces. Where in this labyrinth is a psychic supposed to "arrive" to decode a target that exists as a plurality surrounded by gigabytes of other, unrelated data? The historic lack of remote viewing into computers may not only be because computers were new and scarce, but also because the psychic task itself was difficult, which would explain why computers encountered by psychics were described mainly by their exterior appearances, rather than by the data inside them.

Despite these challenges, this dissertation's goal of demonstrating that psychics can access secrets in computers was achieved. 146 participants from around the world completed a survey about past psychic experiences, and then tried to describe randomly chosen picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets housed on two laptop computers located in Los Angeles. The computers had no networking functionality, were hardened against cyberattacks, and had their screens dimmed to black and covered with cardboard shields to prevent remote viewers from looking at the computers' displays.

Two judging phases were held. In the first phase, the 584 guesses were each judged by 3 judges, who compared a subject's submission against five possible targets that included the actual target, plus four convincing decoys. Judges picked the actual target less often than what would be expected by chance guessing (18.43%) — an indicator that decoys were effectively indistinguishable from targets — although one judge guessed the actual targets at a rate better than chance (21.58%). Judges with moderate confidence in their choices were generally more accurate than judges with high confidence. Judges' results were scored by combining Sum of Ranks and Direct Hits methods, with p-values calculated using a statistical lookup table.

Submissions receiving high scores graduated to a second judging phase, where details in each submission were compared against the actual target and counted, a technique similar to the Figure of Merit method recommended by May, et al. Z-scores, effect sizes, and Shannon's S-values were also calculated.

Based on the U.S. government's own observational and statistical standards for judging whether observed events are likely paranormal or chance, this experiment demonstrated that remote viewers can describe secret data stored in secured computers. Applying the observational standard first, and using picture results as an example, 5 submissions each contained between 4 and 7 matching target details. Certain image targets attracted stronger psychic performance, even though those targets were shown less often than other targets, which supports U.S. government research findings that target content affects performance. Video results were also successful, with top submissions having between 2.5 and 5.5 matching details, and the strongest submission including many specific details about a surreal video clip of a woman and a fake frog. Applying the statistical standard next, picture and video rounds were statistically significant ( $p = 0.000597$  and  $0.000911$ , respectively). ATM PIN rounds were also significant for 3 digits guessed in exact order ( $p = 0.006527$ ), 3 in any order ( $p = 4.118 \times 10^{-6}$ ), and 2 in any order ( $p = 7.84 \times 10^{-6}$ ).

The results corroborated the U.S. government's own findings related to psychic skill, belief in psychic ability, the importance of following specific protocols, and the effectiveness of collusion. For example, opening the experiment to the public supported past conclusions that psychic performance does not require highly trained psychics. Subjects who believed they might have psychic powers had 21.8 times more detailed matches than subjects who answered negatively. 30% of the top-scoring subjects made their guesses near a time window ranging from 12:45 to 14:15 in Local Sidereal Time, which Spottiswoode showed is associated with increased psychic performance. Lastly — similar to U.S. government findings on the effectiveness of colluding — combining psychics' efforts cut down on guesswork when it came to ATM PINs: in four instances where results from two psychics who were targeting the same PIN were combined, their pooled digits reduced the number of brute force guesses needed to retrieve the PIN by a factor of 28 times.

Some experiment results were surprising. While aiming for intended targets, two subjects picked up on details contained in adjacent targets (e.g., a subject targeted a passphrase, but instead described the picture target). During video rounds, several subjects reported details that were not in the video clips used in the experiment, but which were in the original, unedited, full-length videos that the clips had been taken from. These combined findings suggest that psychic hackers may be able to traverse unseen quantum, thought, or other yet-to-be-discovered "threads" that join clusters of information — even when the clusters are physically far apart from each other — similar to how conventional computer hackers traverse vast electronic networks in search of data to steal.

The cybersecurity implications of these findings are concerning, since psychics bypassed passwords and other defenses to obtain details about data located miles away, without knowing exactly where the target computers were stationed, and with no hints given about the target data's contents. Although the target computers were disconnected from all networks, and machines' screens were effectively disabled, subjects still described specific target data, as well as impressions about adjacent targets. Remote viewers could even describe tangential details related to a target, even if those tangential details were physically absent during the experiment, suggesting that if a psychic can pick up on a target, information related to that target — even if such information is stored elsewhere and offline — may also be captured. Clairvoyants succeeded even though target data in the computers was encoded as electronic signals and binary, and interspersed alongside other data in fragments and streams across disks, software, and hardware in transient forms not readily readable by humans — which together suggest psychics can not only find target data that has been divided and encoded, but they can somehow reassemble and decode it as well. Data cannot be protected by obfuscation, therefore, and even data removed from a computer may be vulnerable, if it remains tangentially related to data still on the computer. Even standard encryption may prove an ineffective countermeasure against psychics, since encrypted data must ordinarily be decrypted to be used, rendering it potentially vulnerable momentarily.

While psychic hacking may render many traditional cybersecurity defenses impotent, there are still possible defenses worth researching. One is encryption that never needs to be decrypted (e.g., homomorphic encryption), which can eliminate moments of decryption when plaintext data might be glimpsed by remote viewers. Another is quantum computing: since spying on quantum data is detectable in the physical world, perhaps psychics who remotely observe quantum information clairvoyantly might be detectable as well. A third defense might be using psychics to test systems to see if they are vulnerable to other psychics, or perhaps using psychics to actively defend against clairvoyants in real time.

My hope is that talented remote viewers will choose to use their psychic abilities for good, a lesson I learned from a kind F.B.I. agent when I was a 14-year-old hacker. Perhaps one day, clairvoyants will become our heroes — sensing when psychic hackers are afoot, and then using their paranormal powers to defend our data, privacy, and even national security from prying minds.

Appendix A

Experiment Consent Agreement

Below is the agreement that subjects were required to electronically sign before participating in the experiment:

Informed Consent Agreement for a Psychic Experiment

About The Psychic Experiment

Welcome! Sometimes called clairvoyance, remote viewing is the ability to psychically receive information about places, people, things, or events located miles away, or even in the future.

In this experiment, you'll have the chance to use your psychic abilities to perceive information stored on remote computer(s) that are far away.

(If you are not sure whether you have psychic abilities, that's OK! We're hoping to study a broad range of people, and who knows, you might discover for the first time that you're psychic!).

In order to ensure safety during Covid-19, the experiment will be conducted entirely via the Internet.

This study was authored by Scotch Wichmann, a Parapsychology graduate student studying how technology and paranormal abilities may intersect.

About This Agreement

This Agreement is between you ("you") and Falcon Shamanic Healing & Magick LLC ("us", "we", the "researchers," or the "Company"), a limited liability company in California that researches ESP, remote healing, and other paranormal topics.

Description of Experiment and Data Collection

During the study, you will be asked questions about your beliefs and past experiences involving extrasensory perception ("ESP").

You will also be asked for your first name and email address so researchers can communicate with you. You are permitted to participate in the study more than once, but each participation will require you to supply an email address that is unique. We will only use your email address for communicating with you.

The experiment has three parts. In each part, you will be asked to use any psychic abilities you have to perceive information about "targets" (words, numbers, photos, etc.) stored on the researchers' computer(s). You can also draw pictures of psychic impressions you receive, which you can upload, email, or text to the researchers, if you choose.

The researchers reserve the right to change the targets at any time, and to present situations and targets that appear real, but which are actually simulated.

By visiting the experiment's website, additional information may be collected, including information about your web browser, IP address, geographic location, web pages you visited, and the amount of time you spent answering questions (collectively, "telemetry information").

Your privacy is very important, so we minimize the personal data we collect, and we don't purposefully collect information about other websites you may visit.

To learn more about our data collection and use, see our Privacy Policy at:
https://www.psychicexperiment.org/privacy\_policy/

Data Use and Copyright Permissions

The researchers plan to make their study results public, but data you provide will be reasonably anonymized, which means that when you provide us with your questionnaire answers, texts, emails, pictures, telemetry information, and other data collected by the researchers (collectively, "data" or "your data" or "the data" or "experiment data"), we will mix your data with other participants' data to help obscure where the data came from, and we will also remove your name and email address from textual data prior to any publication.

Since the research data is so critical to the study's success, you expressly grant the researchers and their assigns a worldwide, non-exclusive, irrevocable, royalty-free, fully paid-up license in perpetuity to use, analyze, store, transmit, share, sell, publish, perform, promote, and otherwise make public your data (excluding your name and email address in textual data) without limitation and in any medium or format, and without attributions or copyright notices citing you, since results are intended to be anonymous.

Writers and artists often have unique styles that are readily identifiable. So, while the study's results are intended to be anonymous, you agree and accept that we can't guarantee your anonymity, and you release us from all liability if the public identifies text or images you submit as being authored by you. If your anonymity is important to you, we suggest using a writing or drawing style in your submissions that is different from your typical style, and avoid the use of text or images commonly associated with you.

You are encouraged to submit your data to the study in a timely fashion because the researchers are permitted to conclude collection of the data at any time without advance notice, after which any data not yet submitted will not be eligible for submission and inclusion in the study.

While the researchers intend to publish the study results, they are not required to publish, nor to make the data or study results available to you or any other party, except for certain cases outlined elsewhere in this Agreement.

If your data was included in the study, you'll be emailed a copy of your personal experiment results after the study has been concluded and all data has been analyzed. By participating in the study, you give us permission to email you.

You are encouraged to let people know on Social Media or elsewhere about your participation in the study, and the researchers (who are the copyright holders of this experiment and its website) hereby permit you to publish any text, images, screenshots, or video from the experiment website, provided that you attribute the study's website URL (<https://www.psychicexperiment.org/>) and its author, Scotch Wichmann.

Independent Judging

Psychic impressions you provide during the study, including text you write and pictures you draw, will be shown to a panel of independent judges who determine if your impressions match the psychic targets you were aiming for. Each impression you provide will be judged by three people whose scoring decisions will be combined.

To protect your identity, judging will be blind, meaning judges will not be shown the name and email address you used when you signed up. However, if you include information in your writings or pictures that identifies you (such as your name, email address, a picture of you, etc.), then judges may be able to discern your identity, so we advise not including any personally identifiable information in your writing or pictures, if your anonymity is important to you.

Judges' identities will be kept secret before and during judging, and judges' scoring decisions are final and at their own discretion. Judges may choose to reveal their identities after the study is complete.

Exercising Your Rights

You have many privacy and data protection rights outlined in our Privacy Policy.

However, because data integrity is so important to our scientific study, you expressly permit us to set certain limits on when data is allowed to be changed or revealed to the public, in order to avoid skewing or corrupting experiment results during or after the study:

Requests for Data — You have the right to request a copy of your data exactly one time, but you agree that we are not required to send it until after our study results have been formally published by us. When we do finally share your data with you, your data will only be made available electronically via a digital format and means chosen by us.

Data Changes and Corrections — In order to avoid corrupting the data in our study, you agree that no data changes will be permitted after you have submitted your data to us, except for changes to your first name and email address. You may change your name and email address exactly one time. To preserve the study's data integrity, you agree that under no circumstances will you be permitted to change your experiment answers, text, or pictures you submitted to us.

Data Deletion, or Opting Out of the Study — If you complete the experiment, but later decide you want the data you provided to be deleted, you agree to make your deletion request in writing using the contact form on our Contact page (<https://www.psychicexperiment.org/contact/>) within forty-eight (48) consecutive hours of submitting the data to us (the "cutoff period"), and that the start of the cutoff period shall be determined by us using your data's submission date-and-time stamp stored in our database. You agree that if your deletion request is not received by us within the cutoff period, the researchers are free to keep and use your data according to this Agreement.

Note also that if you choose to have your data deleted in accordance with this Agreement such that your data cannot be included in the study's results, you agree that you will no longer be eligible to participate in the gift card drawing described below.

Random Drawing / No Reimbursement

Our budget is limited, so you won't receive financial payment or other reimbursement for your participation in the study, but if you answer all of the questions in the experiment such that the data you supplied becomes part of the study results, you will be entered into random drawings to win one of three digital Amazon gift cards (commonly known as e-cards), with each card having an available balance of $200 U.S. dollars.

To be eligible for the random drawing, our database must show that you completed the experiment completely when we cease accepting new data from the public, so be sure to continue in the experiment until you reach the "Thank You" page. You agree that due to the Internet's inherent limitations (e.g., network outages, lost network packets, cached web pages, etc.), you will not be eligible for the drawing if your data in our database is found to be incomplete when the data is analyzed by the researchers. You accept that our database is the sole source of evidence proving participation (that is, we won't accept emails, text messages, screenshots, network logs, or other forms of evidence proving participation).

Three study participants randomly chosen by us will each win one gift card, and you are only allowed to win once, even if you participate in the study more than once, so if your contact information is drawn more than once during the drawings, your second winning drawing will be discarded, and drawings will resume until three unique people have won.

The three winners will be chosen randomly from the pool of eligible participants using a digital random number generator (DRNG) in the year 2022 after the study has finished gathering its data from participants, and the three winners will be notified by email.

If you are a gift card winner, (i) we will make reasonable efforts to contact you several times via email, and once we have confirmed your email address with you, we will email your winning card to you via Amazon; (ii) you agree that the researchers shall not be held responsible if you do not receive the email(s), since the Internet and email providers are not always reliable, and you are responsible for ensuring that the email address you provided is accurate and working; (iii) you are responsible for protecting the card's data like any financial instrument and using the card before it expires, and the researchers shall not be required to issue additional or replacement cards for any reason; and, (iv) the gift cards have no cash value, no gift card or gift card balance may be exchanged or refunded for cash, and no cash will be provided to any participant.

The following people are not eligible to win gift cards: (i) researchers or judges or other people involved in administering the study; (ii) study participants who live in jurisdictions where such random drawings are unlawful or where drawings require registration with, or financial payments to, any governing body; (iii) any study participant whom the researchers, in their sole discretion, suspect was engaged in cheating or fraud, including, but not limited to, the use of automation to increase odds of winning a gift card.

Note that if you send us anything through SMS text messages, toll charges may apply, and we're unable to offer reimbursement for those. The same applies if you mail or ship us anything via postal mail or by courier — unfortunately due to our limited budget, we can't offer reimbursement for any postal, shipping, handling, delivery or other fees of any kind.

No Warranty

The researchers offer no representations or warranties regarding or associated with the experiment or your participation or experiment outcomes or publication or usefulness of results, express or implied, either in fact or by operation of law, statute, or otherwise, and you disclaim any and all implied or statutory warranties including warranties of merchantability and of fitness for a particular purpose.

Release of Liability

Your participation in the experiment is entirely voluntary and fully at your own risk, and you agree to hold harmless the researchers, their collaborators, and their assigns from any liability, loss, or damage you may suffer directly or indirectly as a result of your participation.

Governing Law

You agree that all claims arising out of or relating to our Services and this Agreement will be governed by California law, excluding California's conflict of laws rules, and will be litigated exclusively in the federal or state courts of Los Angeles County, California, USA.

Severability

If any part of this Agreement is held or made invalid by a court decision, statute, rule, or otherwise, the remainder of this Agreement shall not be affected thereby.

Your Agreement and Consent

You agree that you have read, understood, and consented to this Agreement, and any questions you had about the experiment or this Agreement were answered to your satisfaction before you gave your consent.

By visiting the experiment's Internet website on the Internet at <https://www.psychicexperiment.org/> or by participating in the study, you agree to the study's Privacy Policy (available online at https://www.psychicexperiment.org/privacy\_policy/) and Terms of Use (available online at https://www.psychicexperiment.org/terms\_of\_use/), which are both included here by reference.

By participating in the study, you consent to this Agreement in its entirety and certify that you are at least 18 years of age.

By clicking on the checkbox on the experiment website's signup page at <https://www.psychicexperiment.org/> that reads, "Yes, I accept the Experiment Agreement and want to participate," you are legally signing and entering into this Agreement electronically in lieu of a handwritten ink signature.

Survey Questions

All 146 participants were asked to answer the following questionnaire before performing psychic exercises. The questions were adapted from the Revised Paranormal Belief Scale and Australian Sheep-Goat Scale, which measure the degree to which participants believe in paranormal powers (Tobacyk; Drinkwater, et al.). The first four questions were required; the rest were optional.

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities?

- Yes
- Maybe — it seems possible
- No

Do you have psychic abilities?

- Yes
- Maybe — I've had experiences that might've been paranormal
- No

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them?

- 1 year
- 5 years
- 10 years
- 20+ years
- Not applicable

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive?

- In my childhood
- In my teen years
- In my adult years
- Not applicable

If you've had psychic experiences, which have you experienced more than once per year?

Mark any that apply:

- Mediumship - see/communicate with deceased people
- Remote Viewing - receive details from things far away
- Clairvoyance - sense information about objects, people, locations, or events
- Precognition - see future events
- Astral Projection - separate your consciousness from your physical body
- Psychometry - touch an object and know information about its history

- Energy Healing - see and use energy to heal others
- Telepathy - reading others' minds
- Non-Human Contact - contacting angels, helping spirits, or extraterrestrials

Some psychic abilities might be unpredictable, while others may be under your full control. Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want?

Mark any that apply:

- Mediumship - see/communicate with deceased people
- Remote Viewing - receive details from things far away
- Clairvoyance - sense information about objects, people, locations, or events
- Precognition - see future events
- Astral Projection - separate your consciousness from your physical body
- Psychometry - touch an object and know information about its history
- Energy Healing - see and use energy to heal others
- Telepathy - reading others' minds
- Non-Human Contact - contacting angels, helping spirits, or extraterrestrials

Are there things that help you have more successful psychic experiences? For each, indicate how much it helps your psychic abilities. Mark any that apply:

Meditation

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Praying

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Fasting

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Focusing my intention on my psychic power

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Magical or religious rituals

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Distracting myself by doing other things (driving, exercising, etc.)

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Shutting my eyes / wearing a blindfold

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Rhythmic noises (drumming, rattling, music, etc.)

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Rocking or swaying

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Being in water (showering, bathing, etc.)

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Burning incense

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes

- Helps often
- I require it

Using crystals (quartz, etc.) or crystal balls

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Alcohol, tobacco, marijuana, or psychedelic drugs

- Not applicable
- Rarely helps
- Helps sometimes
- Helps often
- I require it

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences?

Mark any that apply:

- Being indoors
- Being outdoors
- Showering or bathing
- Being in a moving vehicle
- Noisy settings (cafes, etc.)
- Quiet settings
- Being in the city
- Being in a forest
- Being in the desert

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences?

Mark any that apply:

- Lying down or reclining
- Standing
- Actively moving (walking, running, dancing, etc.)

When are you most psychic?

Mark any that apply:

- In the morning
- Middle of the day
- Evening
- Dead of night
- When I'm wide awake / alert
- When I'm relaxed
- When I'm tired / sleepy
- When I'm asleep

Experiment Constraints

The following constraints were used to help ensure that the experiment remained double-blind, and that subjects would need to retrieve target pictures, video clips, ATM PINs, and passphrases by peering into the target laptops psychically, rather than catching a glimpse of the target data in some other way.

Safeguarding Data During Target Preparation

- The control computer and both target laptops were secured against physical attacks and hacking using controls that included password protection, file encryption, antivirus software, disabled networking services, and storage in a locked safe when not in use. See Appendix M for hardware and software used.
- The picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase target files were stored exclusively on the control computer until deployed.
- Picture and video clip files were given names constructed from random numbers and letters (e.g., horse.jpg might become AuNbe83uQskjd3.jpg) so filenames would give no hint about the files' contents.
- Target data files were stored in an encrypted format until the moment of deployment. The encryption algorithm AES-256 was used.

Safeguarding Targets During Deployment and Psychic Interaction

- The door of the closet housing the target laptops was kept shut except when targets were being changed. The closet was also protected by a Ring-brand security video camera with alerting enabled to detect unauthorized physical access.

- Subjects arriving at the experiment website were randomly assigned either laptop 1 or 2, with each laptop having its own unique set of randomly chosen targets. Assigning subjects to random laptops helped ensure that currently active subject X gained no guaranteed advantage by eavesdropping on the thoughts of currently active subject Y, since X and Y might be assigned to different laptops, and therefore different targets.
- The intended targets were displayed on the target laptops' screens, but each laptop had its screen dimmed to black, and then covered by a cardboard shield that was taped into place to block out errant light. This helped ensure remote viewers had to psychically "reach into" a laptop's electronics, rather than just look at targets displayed on a computer's screen. Screensavers on both laptops were also disabled so targets would remain on display, even though invisible to the naked eye.
- The looping video clip was added as a secret fourth target, and changed daily like the other targets. If subjects were able to describe the video despite not being told about its existence, this would be potential evidence that subjects could not only see intended targets, but unintended targets as well.
- Audio was disabled on the target laptops so video clips would play silently and give no clues about their contents.
- Changing the targets daily helped ensure a psychic could not pick up on mental impressions from a previous day's participant that might offer hints about a target. All four randomly selected picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets were changed on both target laptops at 12:01 a.m.

- Each day's new targets transferred from the control computer to the target laptops by USB stick were deployed by automated scripts to ensure I could not accidentally glimpse any target data. The deployment protocol went as follows:
  - Insert a blank USB stick into the control computer.
  - On the control computer, run a script that generates a random ATM PIN, writes it to a file that has a random filename, and then encrypts that file; generates a random passphrase, writes it to a file that has a random filename, and then encrypts that file; chooses the picture and video targets randomly (their files were already encrypted); and finally, copies the encrypted picture, video, PIN, and passphrase target files from the control computer to the blank USB stick.

See Appendix K for details on how randomness was achieved.
  - Carry the USB stick into the closet, where laptop 1 is housed.
  - Hold down the power button on laptop 1, forcing the computer to reboot. This clears any remnants of the previous image and video targets from the computer's screen and ephemeral memory (RAM).
  - When the laptop starts back up, an automated script on the computer overwrites the previous day's target files with zeroes to destroy their contents, and then deletes the target files. At this point, no previous targets remain on the laptop.
  - Remove the laptop's cardboard shield and tape temporarily.
  - Sign into the laptop with a username and secret password. The operating system's graphical desktop appears. Open a terminal command window.

- Insert the USB stick into the laptop, then run a background script in the terminal window. The script starts, but goes to sleep for 60 seconds before resuming. Close the terminal window.
  - Decrease the laptop screen brightness to black within 60 seconds. Reinstall the cardboard cover, then apply black tape so no errant light can escape. The cardboard covers the sides, top, front, and back of laptop screen.
  - After 60 seconds, the sleeping background script awakens, copying and decrypting the new day's targets from the USB stick to the laptop. The ATM PIN and passphrase target file icons become visible on the desktop, the target picture is opened and moved to the screen's upper-left corner, and the looping video starts playing (although none of these are visible to the naked eye due to the dimmed screen and the cardboard). Before finishing, the background script deletes laptop 1's targets from the USB stick for safety, and copies the laptop's security logs to the USB stick so they can be examined for any signs of intrusion.
  - Repeat the steps above to install laptop 2's entirely different targets onto laptop 2.
- The security logs from the target laptops were retrieved from the USB stick onto the control computer and examined. No unusual activity was found in any security logs.
  - After deploying the targets, another set of scripts were used to update and deploy each day's new mock live feed images for laptops 1 and 2 (see Figure 3 shown earlier for an example of a mock feed). First, a script on the management computer printed the current date onto two mock laptop images, and then copied the images to the USB stick. There was one mock image for laptop 1 (complete with its tiger picture), and one mock image for laptop 2 (with its parrot picture). The USB stick was then carried to the lab's web server where the new images were copied, overwriting the previous day's mock live feed images. When a subject visited the experiment website (which was hosted at Google), the experiment web page served by Google would pull its mock live feed images from the web server in the computer lab, which provided a physical link between subjects and the lab's location in Los Angeles.

- The USB stick was then formatted destructively, resetting it for the next day's use.

Safeguarding Targets During Judging

- When judging began, picture targets, frames taken from video clip targets, and decoy images all needed to be presented to judges on the judging website. These image files were copied from the control computer to the management workstation, where they were decrypted and then uploaded to Cloudinary.com, a secure image hosting service that served up the images during judging. For safety, all image files were given random filenames so judges could not distinguish targets from decoys by looking at the names of files. Files were only uploaded to Cloudinary.com after the experiment closed its doors to the public, so subjects had no opportunity to peek at targets or decoys on the Internet during the experiment.
- ATM PIN targets, passphrase targets, and decoys also needed to be uploaded so judging could begin. All these text-based targets were copied to the management workstation, where they were then uploaded directly into the experiment database hosted by Google.

Source Code for Generating Sum of Ranks and Direct Hits Probability Tables

The computer program source code for generating probability tables that combine Sum of Ranks with Direct Hits is listed below. I transliterated the program line-by-line to the PureBasic programming language from its original Applesoft BASIC code that was written by parapsychologists George P. Hansen and Jessica Utts in 1987 (Hansen and Utts). The original Applesoft version could generate a table for 40 trials with 4 ranks in about 21 hours back in 1987; those same calculations written in PureBasic and running on a 4Ghz iMac with 16GB of RAM in 2023 take less than one second to compute.

Subject Identification Numbers and Locations

To maintain the 146 subjects' anonymity, participants were identified throughout the experiment by identification numbers. The numbers are listed below, along with subjects' approximate geographic coordinates and country abbreviations (when available) as reported by the Google Cloud's App Engine environment that hosted the experiment website.

Target Laptops and Experiment Round Timestamps

Subjects arriving at the experiment website were randomly routed to one of the two target laptops, with each laptop containing its own unique set of randomly selected picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase targets. Shown below are subjects' laptop assignments, start times for each kind of psychic test round, and times when participants completed the experiment. All dates and times are in the experiment's local time (America/Los Angeles).

Judge ID Numbers and Descriptions

The experiment's 6 volunteer judges were assigned identification numbers so their activity could be tracked and analyzed. Descriptions of the judges and their identification numbers are shown below.

Judge ID #	About the Judge
101	Film/TV director-editor, music composer, and part-time inventor (New York)
102	Film/TV writer-producer and skeptic (L.A.)
103	Traditional Chinese Medicine doctor (L.A.)
111	Stage magician specializing in mentalism (L.A.)
115	Hospitality industry executive (New York)
155	Professional psychic-medium (trained at Arthur Findlay College for mediumship in UK) (L.A.)

Correlation of Psychic Performance to Local Sidereal Time (LST)

Spottiswoode (1997) found that psychic operations occurring during a narrow window between 12:45 and 14:15 in Local Sidereal Time (LST) are especially powerful because radiation arriving from the galaxy's center is temporarily blocked by the Earth's core, rather than being allowed to interfere with psychic functioning.

LST times for subjects with the top-five scores in the picture, video, ATM PIN, and passphrase rounds were calculated below. Since Spottiswoode's window is a gradient whose psychic protection falls off gradually, I expanded it by 90 minutes in both directions (11:15 to 3:45 PST) to include subjects who might have been near, but not necessarily inside, the original strict window, while acknowledging that subjects near the window's edges may not have had optimum cosmic shielding. Rows below highlighted in blue indicate submissions received during the expanded window.

Future Research: Homomorphic Encryption to Protect Targets Against Precognition

A challenge in remote viewing research is how to prevent a remote viewer tasked with seeing a target in real time from instead using precognitive powers to see the desired target in the future. An idea for future research that occurred to me during this experiment was to use homomorphic encryption to encrypt a numeric target that never has to be decrypted, yet which can still be validated against a remote viewer's guess. The remote viewer, researchers, judges, and even the computer processing the experiment will only know how many digits of the numeric target were correctly guessed, but without revealing the actual target itself, hypothetically preventing a psychic from precognitively guessing the target.

Homomorphic encryption algorithms allow math to be performed directly against encrypted data (ciphertexts) without first needing to decrypt the data back to its original, unencrypted form (plaintexts) (Lauter, et al.). For example, say there were two secret numbers we wanted to sum, but the numbers had previously been encrypted using traditional (non-homomorphic) encryption. To add the numbers while trying to keep them secret, they would need to be decrypted, summed, then re-encrypted:

The scheme's weakness is that the ciphertexts are momentarily decrypted back to plaintexts, which might be visible to a remote viewer during that moment, or even longer if parts of the plaintexts were inadvertently stored in computer memory as leftover artifacts of the decryption process.

By contrast, homomorphism makes it possible to simply do `ciphertext1 + ciphertext2`. In this scheme, the addition is calculated across the ciphertext surface without any momentary decloaking. Since the two secret numbers are never decrypted, their risk of being exposed in computer memory to a remote viewer is reduced (Lauter, et al.).

To illustrate, two values are homomorphically encrypted, and then summed using their ciphertexts below. This walk-through uses the Python programming language console, and the Paillier homomorphic encryption algorithm.

First, load the encryption library in Python, and create a 512-bit encryption-decryption private key pair:

>>> import phe
>>> from phe import paillier >>> pubkey,privkey = paillier.generate_paillier_keypair(n_length=512)
```

Next, encrypt the two values (addends 1023 and 211) we will sum together later, and assign them to variables `add1` and `add2`:

```
>>> add1=pubkey.encrypt(1023)
>>> add2=pubkey.encrypt(211)
```

Confirm that 1023 and 211 were encrypted by printing out their respective ciphertexts:

```
>>> add1.ciphertext()
25519106208415057936633404031577172967211326394643143109849949833291113

Next, sum the two ciphertexts (which under the hood, also sums the two encrypted plaintexts without decrypting them):

```
>>> PIN = add1 + add2
```

Now view the new sum, which remains in its encrypted form:

```
>>> PIN.ciphertext()
25778419024010957889619003176840252377393694865829162347441140375197122

Finally, decrypt the sum to show that the two addends were indeed added together (1023 + 211 = 1234)

>>> privkey.decrypt(PIN) 1234
```

This technique offers the possibility of keeping ATM PIN targets continually obscured. Rather than working with a plaintext PIN target like 1234 that could leave traces in a computer's memory, we could instead generate two addends whose sum equals 1234, encrypt the addends with homomorphic encryption, and then add them together one digit at a time to arrive at a final, encrypted PIN. Say the addends are 1023 and 0211. In pseudocode we could:

add first digits from 1023 & 0211:
encrypted_targetPIN_digit1=encrypt(1)+encrypt(0)
```

add second digits from 1023 & 0211:
encrypted_targetPIN_digit2=encrypt(0)+encrypt(2)
```

add third digits :
encrypted_targetPIN_digit3=encrypt(2)+encrypt(1)
```

add fourth digits:
encrypted_targetPIN_digit4= encrypt(3)+encrypt(1)

At this stage, the target PIN's four individual digits (1, 2, 3, and 4) exist in homomorphically encrypted form, yet "1234" has never appeared in the computer's memory as plaintext, making it blind to all parties.

Since we know each PIN digit, the digits can be individually compared to the digits in a remote viewer's PIN guess to determine which are matches, e.g.:

if decrypt( encrypted_PIN_digit1 - guess_PIN_digit1 ) == 0
    ...then the PIN target's first digit matches the guess's first digit

if decrypt( encrypted_PIN_digit2 - guess_PIN_digit2 ) == 0
    ...then the PIN target's second digit matches the guess's second digit

...etc.

The subtractions above reveal only the difference between each of a target's digits and a guess's digits, rather than exposing any digits of the target ATM PIN itself. In this way, analysts could determine how many digits in a guess match the digits in a target, and whether the matches are in exact order or some other order, all without getting to see the target.

An even more cautious strategy would be to obscure even the addends as well, to prevent exposure during their creation:

- Generate two random addends (e.g.: 1023 and 0211) in a blind manner
- Homomorphically encrypt them, e.g.: `add1=encrypt(1023)`, `add2=encrypt(211)`
- Perform a random number of homomorphic math operations to add or subtract randomly generated numbers against add1 and add2 until the original addends (in their encrypted state) are arithmetically modified into new addends, e.g.:

newadd1 = loop( add1 = add1 +/- random_number1...N )
newadd2 = loop( add2 = add2 +/- random_number1...N )

After many iterations, the original addends (1023 and 0211) are modified into new addends (e.g., 4829 and 5170), but while remaining encrypted the entire time, meaning they never existed in a plaintext state that could have been observed by a human.

Future researchers might be able to then ask: Can a remote viewer access data that was always blind to all participants and whose plaintext content never existed in a human-readable format? If no humans have ever seen the final PIN, and it never existed as plaintext in any past or future, a remote viewer might need to work harder, perhaps by trying to "see" into the encryption algorithm itself, or into the low-level encryption computing processes, or into the encrypted data itself, which, if successful, would have significant implications for the security of encryption used to protect the world's secrets.

Summary of Survey Data

The survey's results summary is shown below. The percentages given indicate how many of the 146 subjects answered each single-choice or multiple-choice question.

For the survey's raw data, refer to Appendix L1.

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? (Single choice)

87.67%	Yes
12.33%	Maybe — it seems possible
0%	No

Do you have psychic abilities? (Single choice)

42.47%	Yes
50%	Maybe — I've had experiences that might've been paranormal
7.534%	No

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? (Single choice)

1.37%	1 year
3.42%	5 years
4.11%	10 years
74.66%	20+ years
16.44%	Not applicable

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive? (Single choice)

57.53%	In my childhood
14.38%	In my teen years
15.75%	In my adult years
12.33%	Not applicable

If you've had psychic experiences, what kind have you experienced more than once per year? (Multiple choice)

68.49%	Clairvoyance - sense information about objects, people, locations, or events
53.42%	Precognition - see future events
42.47%	Telepathy - reading others' minds
40.41%	Energy Healing - see and use energy to heal others
39.73%	Mediumship - see/communicate with deceased people
32.19%	Non-Human Contact - contacting angels, helping spirits, or extraterrestrials

- 31.51% Astral Projection - separate your consciousness from your physical body
- 28.77% Remote Viewing - receive details from things far away
- 12.33% Psychometry - touch an object and know information about its history

Some psychic abilities might be unpredictable, while others may be under your full control.

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? (Multiple choice)

- 34.93% Clairvoyance - sense information about objects, people, locations, or events
- 25.34% Energy Healing - see and use energy to heal others
- 20.55% Telepathy - reading others' minds
- 16.44% Mediumship - see/communicate with deceased people
- 15.75% Non-Human Contact - contacting angels, helping spirits, or extraterrestrials
- 15.07% Remote Viewing - receive details from things far away
- 12.33% Precognition - see future events
- 8.22% Astral Projection - separate your consciousness from your physical body
- 5.48% Psychometry - touch an object and know information about its history

Are there things that help you have more successful psychic experiences?

For each, indicate how much it helps your psychic abilities. (Multiple choice)

Meditation

- 26.71% Not applicable
- 4.11% Rarely helps

Summary of High-Scoring Picture Submissions

Scores for picture rounds are summarized below for submissions that reached the second round of judging.

In column 1, Rank considered both the Sum of Ranks Score (1=high) and the Number of Detail Matches (enumerating each matching detail between the submission and its target).

Column 2 provides the subject's identification number (see Appendix E for more on identification numbers).

Column 3 shows the Sum of Ranks score combined from 3 judges. As noted in the "First Judging Phase" section earlier, 1 point was originally given for each judge who correctly matched a submission against its target, giving a high possible score of 3 (since each submission was judged by 3 judges). For Sum of Ranks statistical calculations, however, a value of 1 was expected to be the high score, rather than 3, so judging scores were converted to Sum of Ranks scores (a judging high score of 3 became a Sum of Ranks high score of 1, and a low judging score of 1 became a Sum of Ranks score of 3).

Column 4 describes the psychic target. To see pictures of the actual submissions and targets, see Appendix L2 for the raw data.

The far right "List of Details" column enumerates all details matched between a submission and its target, with the total number summarized in column 5. 1 point was given for a detail that appeared to be a direct hit, and 0.5 points were given for abstract matches. Points given for each detail are shown in square brackets.

Overall Rank	Subject #	Sum of Ranks Score	Psychic Target Description	# of Detail Matches	List of Details Matched from Text and/or Drawings Submitted
1 st	33	1	Inside, looking up at glass and metal cathedral dome	7	Metallic [1], rounded / oval [1], elongated / cylindrical [1], suspended material [1], hollow [1], transparent [1], green color [1]
2 nd	43	1	Inside, looking up at glass and metal cathedral dome	6	Blue (sky) [1], beige/sandstone [1], open air [1], rounded/curves [1], arches [1], vertical lines/protrusions around it [1]
3 rd	99	1	Dark cemetery with many leafless trees behind headstones bearing text	5.5	Something boxy to left (headstone) [1], a bushy tree [1], car-like shapes near tree [.5], words near bottom of screen (on headstones) [1], green [1], slight arch shape with words (headstones) [1]
4th (tie)	12	1	Log piles beside sunlit forest path	4	Heavy forest [1], path [1], sunlight [1], path curve direction in drawing matches [1]
4th (tie)	95	1	Dark cemetery with many leafless trees behind headstones bearing text	4	Black rectangle (base of headstones) [1], fuzzy (tree branches) [.5], triangle shape match for headstones [1], trapezoidal shape drawn match for headstones in lower-right corner of photo [1], several features look like black birds [.5]
5 th	89	1	River gauge with numbers	3.5	Tree-like (vertical) [.5], angled downward [1], red [1], yellow [1]
6 th	90	1	Bicyclist calmly driving his bike off a paved path, about to fall into river near a bridge	3	Water [1], then fall [1], crash (impending) [1]
7 th	65	1	Many streetlamps standing together in L.A.	2.5	Bars / vertical lines [1], tasted food (there is an actual café next door to the streetlamps) [.5], trunks of elephants (gray & shaped like the streetlamps) [1]

8th (tie)	93	1	Primary colored hot air balloons rising into blue sky	2	Windows logo (Windows logo primary colors same as balloons) [.5], blue sky background [1], icons (look like smaller balloons) [.5]
8th (tie)	86	1	River gauge with numbers	2	Mention of a tool [1]; mention of piano (markings shaped very much like piano keys) [1]
8th (tie)	14	1	Log piles beside sunlit forest path	2	Garden-like [.5], subject on left hand (logs) [.5], right side more open [.5], peaceful [.5]
9 th	11	1	Camel walking past Egypt pyramids	1.5	Yellow background / cinnamon (color) [1]; truck going over a bridge resembles camel in foreground [.5]
10th (tie)	135	2	Old West ghost town	3	Yellowish light [1]; dusky [1]; right lower part of image closer to person capturing the image [1]
10th (tie)	83	2	Bicyclist calmly driving his bike off a paved path, about to fall into river near a bridge	3	Human head [1], looking to the left [1], outdoors [1]
10th (tie)	85	2	Bicyclist calmly driving his bike off a paved path, about to fall into river near a bridge	3	Water [1], in background [1], something sticking up like bunny ears (drawing good match for bike man legs sticking downward instead of upward) [1]
11 th	9	2	Photo of green, grassy labyrinth with spirals of vegetation under blue sky; and, video of zigzag pattern on floor with man dancing in front of red curtain	2	Picked up on both the picture and video together (both were visible on target computer screen at same time): soft & circular (green labyrinth) [2]; hard, jagged shape (zigzag floor video). Only scoring photo here.
12 th	32	2	Vintage B&W photo of man tied up & lying on floor next to scattered playing cards & debris	1.5	Figure of a human [1]; statue (human is still, possibly drunk or dead) [.5]
13 th	64	2	Vintage B&W photo of front-line soldiers in trench w/hats & guns under smoke toward barbed wire	1	Oval hat shape [.5], lines look like guns sticking up [.5]
14 th	130	2	Old West ghost town	0.5	Serengeti (desert scene) [.5]

15th (tie)	88	2	Bicyclist calmly driving his bike off a paved path, about to fall into river near a bridge	0	No detailed matches found.
15th (tie)	1	2	Edvard Munch, The Scream	0	No detailed matches found.

Column 4 describes the psychic target. To see actual submissions and targets, see Appendix L3 for the raw data.

The far right "List of Details" column enumerates details matched between a submission and its target, with the total number summarized in column 5. 1 point was given for a detail that appeared to be a direct hit, and 0.5 points were given for abstract matches. Points given for each detail are shown in square brackets.

Rank	Subject #	Sum of Ranks Score	Psychic Target Description	# of Detail Matches	List of Details Matched from Text and/or Drawings Submitted
1 st	141	1	White makeup-faced woman up close, her red lipsticked lips/teeth plucking a green frog from glass jar containing green liquid	5.5	Clown face (woman expression and wig) [1], "sad clown" mouth and cleft above lip [1], teeth (frog pulled out of water by woman teeth, and interestingly, the teeth were not directly visible in the clip used in the experiment, but were visible in the original footage just after the clip used) [1], red (toy wind-up teeth typically red, like the intense red lipstick) [.5], amphibian/reptile-type animal (frog in video) [1], in the water [1]
2nd (tie)	133	1	Angry blonde red-faced man in a suit yelling and raising his fist in a fancy room	4	Human face [1], blurry yellow background / yellow flowers in background (floral metal mirror frame is yellow bronze) [1], blonde hair [1], button-up shirt (off-white or light beige) [1]
2nd (tie)	72	1	Short-haired woman standing and smiling with outstretched arms in open/sweeping green field, sky looks sunny but cold	4	Wide open space [1], living thing standing [1], mountainous background [1], cold [1]
3 rd	137	1	Scared dark-haired woman cowering in white hotel bathroom with a knife (scene from The Shining)	3	A mother [1], on vacation [1], in mountain location [1]
4th (tie)	40	1	White makeup-faced woman up close, her red lipsticked lips/teeth plucking a green frog from glass jar containing green liquid	2.5	Woman [1], an animal [1], something spherical [.5]
4th (tie)	144	1	Scared dark-haired woman cowering in white hotel bathroom with a knife (scene from The Shining)	2.5	Hospital (white bathroom) [.5], blood (risk of violence, blood/twins scene in The Shining) [.5], heartbeat (frequent audio effect in The Shining, but not present in this clip) [1], heartbeat (rhythmic sound of Jack using the axe on the bathroom door) [.5]

5th (tie)	111	1	Short-haired woman standing and smiling with outstretched arms in open/sweeping green field, sky looks sunny but cold	2	Short-haired woman [1], smiling [1]
5th (tie)	9	1	Photo of green, grassy labyrinth with spirals of vegetation under blue sky; and, video of zigzag pattern on floor with man dancing in front of red curtain	2	Picked up on both the picture and video together (both were visible on target computer screen at same time): soft & circular (green labyrinth); hard texture [1], jagged shape (zigzag floor video) [1]. Only video here.
6th (tie)	36	1	White makeup-faced woman up close, her red lipsticked lips/teeth plucking a green frog from glass jar containing green liquid	1	Glass bottle [1]
6th (tie)	83	1	Scared dark-haired woman cowering in white hotel bathroom with a knife (scene from The Shining)	1	No match for the playing video, but do appear to be describing the still photo that was next to the video.
7 th	105	2	Short-haired woman standing and smiling with outstretched arms in green field, sky looks sunny by cold	2.5	Outside/open land [1], brightness [1], landscape scenery (correct, but general) [.5]
8th (tie)	45	2	Short man in red suit standing on black and white zigzag floor in front of red curtain	0	No detailed matches found.
8th (tie)	56	2	Man in shorts jogging along curving floor in white structure / spaceship	0	No detailed matches found.

8th (tie)	132	2	Angry blonde red-faced man in a suit yelling and raising his fist in a fancy room	0	No detailed matches found.

Summary of High-Scoring ATM PIN Submissions

Scores for ATM PIN rounds are summarized below for submissions that reached the second round of judging.

Column 1 gives the submission's overall rank, column 2 provides the subject's identification number, and column 3 is the Sum of Ranks score combined from 3 judges. Sum of Ranks determined which submissions reached the second round of judging, after which direct counting of the number of matching digits between submissions are targets was used for final rank scoring.

Column 4 shows the PIN target, and column 5 lists the "Best Guess" submitted by a subject. Providing a best guess was necessary because some participants submitted more than one guess.

Column 6 lists the number of digits correctly matched in any order between a submission and target, while the far-right column shows how many digits were in exact order. The 1st-ranked submission, for example, correctly matched 3 digits (1-2-3) in exact order.

To see participants' actual submissions, refer to Appendix L4 for the raw data.

Appendix K

Randomness

Ensuring psychic targets were chosen using high quality randomness was important to eliminate opportunities for my own unconscious biases when selecting targets; erase detectable patterns in lineups of targets and decoys; and, to demonstrate that subjects' psychic hits greatly exceeded outcomes expected if participants had engaged in chance guessing of randomly selected targets (Milton and Wiseman 18-24).

I wrote the software referenced below in PureBasic, a cross-platform BASIC compiler that generates native executable code, with support for inline assembly (Fantaisie Software).

Physical Sources of Randomness

Two physical sources of randomness were used, starting with RDSEED, digital random number generator circuitry accessible in modern Intel CPU processors. Unlike computer-generated pseudorandom number generators (PRNGs) that rely on purely digital algorithms to achieve randomness, RDSEED offers greater entropy, relying on a true random number generator (TRNG) that employs real-world thermal noise — a physical entropy source in chips' silicon — to generate non-deterministic streams of random bits of high cryptographic quality (Intel 8-15). Software programs used in the experiment were made to call RDSEED directly via the inline Assembly language call `rdseed eax`.

A GQ GMC-300E Plus model Geiger counter provided a second physical source of randomness. Arrivals of cosmic radioactive particles are known to be unpredictable (Ruschen, et al.), so counting the number of newly arrived particles every few seconds generates practical random data streams (Pandey, et al.). To count these, I wrote software to read the number of particles counted since the last Geiger counter check, appended the particle count number to an output file, and then repeated the cycle. Newly arrived particle counts typically ranged between zero and four new particles per second, which were written to the output file as a continuous, unbroken string of numbers. I captured data at different times over five days into five output files total, truncated the files so they became equal sizes, and then combined these into a single working file by converting each file to binary numbers, and then using a standard exclusive-or (XOR) operation to XOR each file over the next to wipe out any predictable runs resulting from long-running cosmic radiation events, an idea inspired by Sunar, et al. (6-7), who discussed how determinism can be reduced by chaining sources of randomness together. The Geiger data capture software source code is presented later in this Appendix section.

In some cases discussed later, the two physical sources of randomness were combined, using RDSEED to randomly select a given value from the random Geiger counter data. For example, a RDSEED call yielding the random integer 20 would select the 20th random value in the Geiger counter data.

RDSEED and Geiger counter randomness were both tested for randomness quality before being used, as standard Parapsychology protocols require (Milton and Wiseman 24). The "Randomness Quality Testing" section below offers test details.

Pseudorandomness Usage

For randomness involving the experiment website and its database, pseudorandom number generation (PRNG) was used, which is digitally simulated randomness generated by an algorithm whose random-looking (but deterministic) sequences come from calculations that begin from some initial seed value (Intel 5-6). PRNG was used here for convenience because

PHP and SQL — the coding languages used to build the experiment website and control its database — did not have native access to a true physical source of randomness.

The random decoys chosen for each round from the pool of available decoys, for example, were chosen using the database's SQL `rand()` command, which pulls data from the database in random-looking order, but whose randomness is only pseudorandom (MySQL). The order in which judging rounds were presented was also chosen from the database using `rand()`.

Similarly, when the fake and real targets were intermixed and presented to judges on the experiment website, this on-the-fly shuffling was provided by the `shuffle()` command in PHP. `Shuffle()` uses the popular Mersenne Twister algorithm for producing convincing-looking random values, even though they are pseudorandom (Matsumoto; PHP).

Pseudorandomness was deemed sufficient for these cases. While attacks on pseudorandomness are possible (e.g., trying to determine an original seed value to predict what comes next in a pseudorandom sequence), such attacks generally require knowledge that randomness is even being attempted, an understanding of the underlying random-generating architecture, and opportunities to learn from repeated attack attempts (Kelsey, et al.; Kamkar). In our case, an attacker altering the pseudorandom order of rounds, or the pseudorandom order of targets shown in a round, would give no hint about which targets were decoys or real. Further, the `rand()` command used to select decoys from the database was used before judging even started (a judging database table was built before any judges were even chosen) so there was no opportunity during the experiment to alter selection of judges' decoys via attacks against the database or PHP.

Shuffling

When a target needed to be chosen from a list of possible options, the Durstenfeld shuffle algorithm was used to guarantee a random transposition for every item in the list of available targets (Mikawa and Tanaka; O'Connor). In a shuffle,  $n!$  derangements are possible for  $n$  integers, where a derangement is a permutation where every element finds its way to a new position without any fixed points (Mikawa and Tanaka 722). I wrote a shuffling software implementation that used RDSEED as the randomness source for each shuffle, using Durstenfeld's 1964 algorithm described below in pseudocode by O'Connor:

For  $k \leftarrow n, n - 1, \dots, 2$  do {
    Choose at random a number  $r$  in  $[1, k]$ , then interchange  $\pi[r]$  and  $\pi[k]$ , where  $\pi[1 \dots n]$  is the array to be shuffled or randomly permuted
}

Picture, Passphrase, and Video Target Randomness, and Random Drawing

RDSEED was the randomness source for choosing randomly selected picture, passphrase, and video targets.  $N$  possible options of picture files, passphrases, and video files were first mixed randomly using the Durstenfeld shuffle described earlier. Then, RDSEED was called to choose a random target  $R$  between 1 and  $N$ .

This same method was employed on December 15, 2022 to pick the 3 subjects from the 146 participants who would receive Amazon gift cards.

Randomness of ATM PIN Targets

Picking random ATM PIN digits required special consideration. Parapsychology best practices dictate that a generated random number should not be the psi target itself, but should instead serve as an index that points to the intended target instead, since computer-based random generators have been shown to be susceptible to psychokinetic perturbation (Williams). A random abstraction layer between the numerical random source and the actual numerical target was prudent so that if a subject did somehow force the generator to pick random number R, R would simply map to another randomly selected number that was the actual target unknown to the subject (Milton and Wiseman 80).

Next, each digit in a target ATM PIN needed to have roughly the same chance of being chosen as any other digit, meaning there needed to be an equal number of zeroes, ones, twos, threes, etc. The random numbers generated by RDSEED could not be used as ATM PIN numbers themselves, because they were found to follow Benford's Law, which states that the leading digits in a multi-digit number follow distribution patterns that can be predictable (Stoessiger). Benford's Law is not a deficiency in RDSEED, but a property of multi-digit numbers detected in a wide array of human-made and natural data sets, including population counts, environmental measurements, atomic weights, death rates, etc. (Scott and Fasli).

To circumvent these limitations, the random Geiger counter data mentioned earlier was used to choose random digits via the following procedure:

1. Group digits 0 through 9 into five tuples: (0,1), (2,3), (4,5), (6,7), and (8,9).
2. Read the first bit of the XOR'd binary Geiger data capture file, and treat it as a coin flip for the first tuple (0,1). If the bit is 0 ("tails"), then choose the 0 in (0,1); if the bit is 1 ("heads"), then choose the 1 in (0,1). Record the chosen digit into a digits output file.
3. Read the next random Geiger bit (0 or 1), and treat it as a coin flip. If tails, choose 2 in (2,3); if heads, choose 3 in (2,3). Append the chosen digit to the digits output file.

4. Repeat step 3 above, reading each next Geiger bit, and choosing each next corresponding tuple digit (0 picks the first digit, and 1 picks the second). After the digit in the final tuple (8,9) is chosen, loop around and start again with the first tuple (0,1). When all Geiger bits have been processed, the digits output file should contain roughly equal numbers of each digit (0-9), provided that the Geiger data itself is indeed random with a roughly equal distribution of zeros and ones (and it was, as we see later). The Geiger counter file was 12,802 bytes in size, and so it produced a corresponding random digits file of the same size.

5. Randomly shuffle all digits in the output file using the Durstenfeld algorithm mentioned earlier. This is necessary because although the output file now contains digits randomly chosen by the Geiger binary data, the digits fall into runs mirroring the tuples' order. For example, if the first five random Geiger bits were 11111 (all heads), this would choose five digits of 13579, which are in the same order as the tuples they were chosen from, meaning digits are randomly selected, but their order in the output file is not sufficiently random, so they must be shuffled thoroughly before use.

6. Call RDSEED to generate a random number  $R$ , then, treating the digits output file as a circular array, choose the  $R$ th digit in the file as the target.

7. Repeat steps 5-6 above to choose the rest of the digits needed, shuffling the entire file before choosing each random  $R$ ; a typical 4-digit ATM PIN number cycles through the steps four times.

In summary,

- All digits zero through nine are made available with near-equal frequency because of incremental cycling through the five tuples.

- Geiger counter data generates a random stream of digits by picking them from tuples, and RDSEED picks the ATM numbers from the stream. As I will demonstrate next, both Geiger counter bits and RDSEED are random generators comparable to coin flipping.
- Predictable Benford's Law distributions were not detectable in the final random numbers generated using the above method.
- Even if a guesser could psychically force RDSEED to pick a desired random number R repeatedly (e.g., force RDSEED to generate R=5 three times in a row), no advantage is gained, since R itself is not the psi target; instead, R points to a target in the random digits stream that changes before every next ATM PIN digit is chosen, thanks to repeated Durstenfeld shuffling.

Randomness Quality Testing

Software is available to test the quality of randomness. Tests of entropy, data frequency, runs of repeating values, etc. can confirm whether the experiment's RDSEED and Geiger counter data were measurably random.

The Statistical Test Suite (STS) provided by the U.S. National Institute of Standards and Technology (NIST) is one such test suite (Sunar, et al. 4). STS includes many automated tests that have been calibrated such that a p-value greater than or equal to 0.01 indicates a given set of data can be "considered to be random with a confidence of 99.9%", and each test also outputs a pass-or-fail grade for easy interpretation (Rukhin, et al. 16).

A second randomness test suite is Dieharder, a set of mathematical tests known in literature (Sunar, et al. 4) that have been compiled into an Open Source program by Duke University physics professor Robert G. Brown (Brown). The suite includes tests found in STS, plus others providing calculated p-values and pass-fail grading.

RDSEED and the Geiger counter data were tested for randomness with successful results. A 15,045-byte file of binary data generated by RDSEED contained 51% of ones and 49% of zeroes, similar to what might be expected from fair coin tosses, and the file passed both the STS and Dieharder test suites. Next, the XOR'd Geiger counter binary data file mentioned earlier with a size of 12,802 bytes contained 49.5% ones to 50.5% zeroes — on par with randomness expected of fair coin flips — and it also passed the STS and Dieharder test suites. The XOR'd Geiger counter binary data file, the RDSEED capture file, and the STS and Dieharder test results are included at the end of this Appendix section.

The random data was tested against Benford's Law next. Following the steps described earlier for picking random digits using tuples, a 12,802-byte file of random digits was generated by treating the ones and zeros in the XOR'd Geiger counter data capture file as coin tosses. The frequency distribution of the digits chosen is shown in the table below. A frequency percentage near 10 means the chance of picking that digit was very close to chance (1/10). The table also shows that the digits' distribution does not follow Benford's Law, with a frequency variance drastically less than Benford's (Morrow).

4	10.30	9.69
0	10.20	n/a
8	10.03	5.11
3	10.02	12.5

2	10.00	17.6
6	10.00	6.7
7	10.00	5.8
9	9.98	4.58
1	9.98	30.1

Random Data File Generated by RDSEED Calls

The random data below was generated by calling the RDSEED instruction in an Intel CPU repeatedly, then converting the data to binary (see discussion earlier in this Appendix section).

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? None

Which things help you have more successful psychic experiences? (1) fasting (helps sometimes), (2) focusing intention (helps sometimes), (3) magical or religious rituals (helps often), (4) shutting my eyes (helps often), (5) rhythmic noises (helps often), (6) being in water (helps often), (7) burning incense (helps sometimes), (8) alcohol or drugs (helps often)

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences? (1) being indoors, (2) being outdoors, (3) showering or bathing, (4) quiet settings

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences? (1) lying down, (2) standing

When are you most psychic? (1) when I'm relaxed

SUBJECT #2

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? Yes

Do you have psychic abilities? Maybe

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? 10 years

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive? In my adult years

Which psychic experiences have you experienced more than once per year? (1) Remote Viewing, (2)

Telepathy

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? None

Which things help you have more successful psychic experiences? (1) meditation (helps sometimes), (2) focusing intention (helps sometimes), (3) distracting myself by doing other things (helps sometimes), (4) shutting my eyes (helps sometimes), (5) using crystals (helps often), (6) alcohol or drugs (helps sometimes)

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences? (1) being indoors, (2) quiet settings

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences? Did not answer

When are you most psychic? Did not answer

SUBJECT #3

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? Yes

Do you have psychic abilities? Maybe

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? 20+ years

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive? In my teen years

Which psychic experiences have you experienced more than once per year? (1) Clairvoyance, (2) Precognition, (3) Astral Projection, (4) Psychometry, (5) Telepathy

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? (1) Clairvoyance, (2) Telepathy

Which things help you have more successful psychic experiences? (1) focusing intention (helps often), (2) shutting my eyes (helps sometimes), (3) rhythmic noises (helps sometimes)

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences? (1) being indoors, (2) being outdoors, (3) quiet settings

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences? (1) standing

When are you most psychic? (1) evening, (2) when I'm wide awake, (3) when I'm relaxed

SUBJECT #4

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? Maybe

Do you have psychic abilities? Maybe

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? 20+ years

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive? In my childhood

Which psychic experiences have you experienced more than once per year? (1) Precognition, (2) Telepathy

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? None

Which things help you have more successful psychic experiences? (1) meditation (rarely helps), (2) praying (rarely helps), (3) fasting (rarely helps), (4) focusing intention (rarely helps), (5) magical or religious rituals (rarely helps), (6) distracting myself by doing other things (rarely helps), (7) rhythmic noises (rarely helps), (8) rocking or swaying (rarely helps), (9) being in water (rarely helps), (10) burning incense (helps sometimes), (11) using crystals (rarely helps), (12) alcohol or drugs (rarely helps)

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences? (1) noisy settings (cafes, etc.)

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences? (1) standing

When are you most psychic? (1) when I'm wide awake

SUBJECT #5

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? Yes

Do you have psychic abilities? Maybe

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? 20+ years

If you have psychic abilities, when did they first arrive? In my adult years

Which psychic experiences have you experienced more than once per year? (1) Mediumship

Which psychic abilities can you invoke whenever you want? None

Which things help you have more successful psychic experiences? (1) praying (helps sometimes), (2) distracting myself by doing other things (helps sometimes)

Which environment(s) help you have psychic experiences? (1) being indoors, (2) quiet settings

Which body position(s) are best for psychic experiences? (1) lying down

When are you most psychic? (1) dead of night, (2) when I'm tired

SUBJECT #6

Do you believe some people have psychic abilities? Maybe

Do you have psychic abilities? No

If you have psychic abilities, how long have you had them? Not applicable

Picture Submissions, Targets, and Scoring Raw Data

The picture targets and submissions for all 146 participants are included below. Each summary includes the subject's identification number; overall rank in the pictures category; how 3 judges voted; the picture target; the subject's written impression and psychic guess with a receipt timestamp; pictures or drawings submitted by the subject; and, a list of all matches between the submission and target detected (assuming the submission successfully reached the second judging round where Detailed Matching took place).

Subjects' writing in submissions is provided exactly as received, including any typographical errors. Impressions and psychic guesses are in italics for emphasis. Pictures and drawings were reduced in size to fit in this document.

SUBJECT #1

Rank in Pictures Category: 15th (tie)

Judges' Raw Score: 2

(Judge #101 matched target, Judge #102 matched target, Judge #115 picked decoy)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-23 18:02:21): I Intuitively sensed it.

Subject's Guess: I saw an apple on a green screen

SUBJECT #2

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #101, #102, & #155 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 08:03:40): At first I saw Scotch smiling, and realized that was more of a memory. Then I saw a cartoon crocodile smiling, sitting up on its tail. The third image that came to mind was of a house, made of brick or stone with a smoking chimney. The first two images made me smile, while the third makes me feel warming.

Subject's Guess: At this point, my brain has assembled an image of a house in the countryside, a fall image of a house cobbled together with stone or brick, with a smoking chimney. An alligator or crocodile, out of place, but very much real, sleeps soundly in the flanking autumn leaves.

No matching details were found.

SUBJECT #3

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #101, #102, & #115 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 09:41:59): I see an animal. A medium sized brown dog. The dog is sitting and looking up at the camera.

Subject's Guess: It is an informal photo taken with a cell phone of a pet who is greatly loved. A medium sized brown dog.

No matching details were found.

SUBJECT #4

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #101, #102, & #115 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 13:10:39): It just seemed kind of normal

Subject's Guess: The main windows screen with the blue background and icons.

No matching details were found.

SUBJECT #5

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #101, #102, & #155 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 18:19:02): I felt teeth, then dark eye holes, then was pushed back in my seat with an image of a skull.

Subject's Guess: A skull with black eye holes on a blue background

No matching details were found.

SUBJECT #6

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #101, #102, & #155 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 19:37:47): I thought of food, fast food in particular (not good food) and a warm day. It might have been the mention of L.A. but I was thinking a city with trees in the mid 80s. I also thought of a happy dog. So the general feeling I would describe is warm in temperature, and happiness in the area.

Subject's Guess: I imagined this is a pet owners picture. A happy dog looking at the camera in forefront at a suburban area with trees. Concrete ground (not pictured) I drew a street light over the dog. And 80's-90's office buildings in the background. Because my initial thought was fast food, I ended up drawing a burger sign poking out above the trees on the right side of the scribble.

No matching details were found.

SUBJECT #7

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #111, #102, & #155 all picked decoys)

SUBJECT #13

Rank in Pictures Category: Score & # of matches too low to rank

Judges' Raw Score: 0

(Judges #111, #102, & #115 all picked decoys)

Target picture:

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-26 13:06:22): I haven't really ever tried visualizing for my psychic abilities before so I don't know if I am able to focus the way I need to.....but my first thought was of something that was shaped like Broccoli and I imagined the color green right away. But as my mind wandered, swayed off course I think and started thinking of ice cream or a spoon and then it came back to the green color and something alive like Frankenstein. But then it morphed into something with a swaying movement like the wind blown long hair of a woman in a convertible car with a bright smile. Which then led me back somehow to a big tree with large limbs and a lot of green leaves.

Subject's Guess: I would say that it's a very large tree with a solid brown trunk and covered in green leaves....there are several tree branches that may have been wind blown or maybe the wind is strong and they are blowing in the wind - but since this is a still photo, that probably doesn't make sense. I feel strongly that wind is important to mention.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-27 14:14:36): Sense of calm. Image of experiment creator in front of the computer, with a sense of "whooshing" in the visual...like the way a zippy drone might move in a closet: whoosh! Flashes of gestures on the screen, like bold paint strokes. Not details of an image, more like an outline of an overall composition. It wasn't more than about 3-4 minutes and a clear sense of completion came over me.

Subject's Guess: The picture comes through as non-image, more like movements in a particular set space. The 8.5 x 11" paper in front of me was imagined as mimicking the laptop screen. The bottom left has a heavy piece, like a tree/lollipop shape. Then planes appeared like a digital rendering of a room, with the ability to tilt the room to observe it from different perspectives. The lines came in a total of 3, each an individual movement to the paper. The 3 lines created a place as if looking down into a three dimensional space at a slight angle. So there was the lollipop tree, the three line to form the plane and then the final gesture was a us shaped SWOOSH across the page.

It felt familiar, yet I still don't know if I'm psychic at all. I sometimes feel energy coming towards me or emanating all around my face and neck then I sorta have an insight about something.*

Subject's Guess: I ended up seeing a school, like one of those schools built in the antebellum South. It had a plantation feel, yet it gave off a scholastic energy. The double doors I saw felt welcoming to the academically inclined. Maybe I saw a library? I'm not sure. The image made me feel comfortable but I knew it wasn't really a home. It was a safe space of some type. It was both impressive yet understated. There was a freeze (sp?) over the entryway like they had on the building at Columbia.

Video Submissions, Targets, and Scoring Raw Data

Video targets and submissions for all 146 participants are included below. Each summary includes the subject's identification number; overall rank in the videos category; how 3 judges voted; a still frame from the video target; the subject's written impression and psychic guess with a receipt timestamp; pictures or drawings submitted by the subject; and, a list of all matches between the submission and target detected (assuming the submission successfully reached the second judging round where Detailed Matching took place).

Subjects' writing in submissions is provided exactly as received, including any typographical errors. Impressions and psychic guesses are in italics for emphasis. Pictures and drawings were reduced in size to fit in this document.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 08:03:40): At first I saw Scotch smiling, and realized that was more of a memory. Then I saw a cartoon crocodile smiling, sitting up on its tail. The third image that came to mind was of a house, made of brick or stone with a smoking chimney. The first two images made me smile, while the third makes me feel warming.

Subject's Guess: At this point, my brain has assembled an image of a house in the countryside, a fall image of a house cobbled together with stone or brick, with a smoking chimney. An alligator or crocodile, out of place, but very much real, sleeps soundly in the flanking autumn leaves.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-24 19:37:47): I thought of food, fast food in particular (not good food) and a warm day. It might have been the mention of L.A. but I was thinking a city with trees in the mid 80s. I also thought of a happy dog. So the general feeling I would describe is warm in temperature, and happiness in the area.

Subject's Guess: I imagined this is a pet owners picture. A happy dog looking at the camera in forefront at a suburban area with trees. Concrete ground (not pictured) I drew a street light over the dog. And 80's-90's office buildings in the background. Because my initial thought was fast food, I ended up drawing a burger sign poking out above the trees on the right side of the scribble.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-26 13:06:22): I haven't really ever tried visualizing for my psychic abilities before so I don't know if I am able to focus the way I need to.....but my first thought was of something that was shaped like Broccoli and I imagined the color green right away. But as my mind wandered, swayed off course I think and started thinking of ice cream or a spoon and then it came back to the green color and something alive like Frankenstein. But then it morphed into something with a swaying movement like the wind blown long hair of a woman in a convertible car with a bright smile. Which then led me back somehow to a big tree with large limbs and a lot of green leaves.

Subject's Guess: I would say that it's a very large tree with a solid brown trunk and covered in green leaves....there are several tree branches that may have been wind blown or maybe the wind is strong and they are blowing in the wind - but since this is a still photo, that probably doesn't make sense. I feel strongly that wind is important to mention.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-10-27 14:14:36): Sense of calm. Image of experiment creator in front of the computer, with a sense of "whooshing" in the visual...like the way a zippy drone might move in a closet: whoosh! Flashes of gestures on the screen, like bold paint strokes. Not details of an image, more like an outline of an overall composition. It wasn't more than about 3-4 minutes and a clear sense of completion came over me.

Subject's Guess: The picture comes through as non-image, more like movements in a particular set space. The 8.5 x 11" paper in front of me was imagined as mimicking the laptop screen. The bottom left has a heavy piece, like a tree/lollipop shape. Then planes appeared like a digital rendering of a room, with the ability to tilt the room to observe it from different perspectives. The lines came in a total of 3, each an individual movement to the paper. The 3 lines created a place as if looking down into a three dimensional space at a slight angle. So there was the lollipop tree, the three line to form the plane and then the final gesture was a us shaped SWOOSH across the page.

I could hear a slight swoosh in my ears when I would close my eyes to focus on the image on the computer screen. The swoosh sound felt grounding, like I was re-orienting myself towards my center. It felt familiar, yet I still don't know if I'm psychic at all. I sometimes feel energy coming towards me or emanating all around my face and neck then I sorta have an insight about something.*

Subject's Guess: I ended up seeing a school, like one of those schools built in the antebellum South. It had a plantation feel, yet it gave off a scholastic energy. The double doors I saw felt welcoming to the academically inclined. Maybe I saw a library? I'm not sure. The image made me feel comfortable but I knew it wasn't really a home. It was a safe space of some type. It was both impressive yet understated. There was a freeze (sp?) over the entryway like they had on the building at Columbia.

ATM PIN Submissions, Targets, and Scoring Raw Data

ATM PIN targets and submissions for all 146 participants are included below. Each summary includes the subject's identification number; overall rank in the ATM PINs category; how 3 judges voted; the ATM PIN number target; the subject's written impression and psychic guess with a receipt timestamp; pictures or drawings submitted by the subject; and, a list of all digits matched between the submission and target (assuming the submission successfully reached the second judging round where Detailed Matching took place).

Subjects' writing in submissions is provided exactly as received, including any typographical errors. Impressions and psychic guesses are in italics for emphasis. Pictures and drawings were reduced in size to fit in this document.

Passphrase Submissions, Targets, and Scoring Raw Data

Passphrase targets and submissions for all 146 participants are included below. Each summary includes the subject's identification number; overall rank in the passphrase category; how 3 judges voted; the passphrase target; the subject's written impression and psychic guess with a receipt timestamp; pictures or drawings submitted by the subject; and, a list of all matches detected between the submission and target (assuming the submission successfully reached the second judging round where Detailed Matching took place).

Subjects' writing in submissions is provided exactly as received, including any typographical errors. Impressions and psychic guesses are in italics for emphasis. Pictures and drawings were reduced in size to fit in this document.

Then I thought that "love conquers all" is a nice phrase, but just because I think it's nice doesn't mean it's correct in this context. I settled on "veni vidi vici" because I thought that it would be fun if it was latin, although very difficult for people to guess, so perhaps that's not it either, but I'm sticking with it anyway. Three guesses, and three words each guess. I never thought of a fourth word.*

Restless, anxious male mid 30's. Most of what I do is tune into peoples emotional state. I work with people in psychiatrica, so most of my abilities are honed into the human experience. Words, letters, and some images are not as easy for me. I have asked my guides to please refrain from sending dead people to me. I officially gave up the mediumship portal. Many past experiences of helping others cross over. As I've aged, I have set up psychic boundaries in order to protect myself from too much input from the eatheric world.

Subject's Psychic Impressions: (received at 2022-11-06 19:44:40): My first impression was the phrase, "God is great" and I felt something in my gut connecting me to the phrase. When I asked my heart whether this is the phrase, it said no. I then "heard" that it would be a variation on that phrase and I heard the word "magnanimous". I then asked my heart what the phrase would be and it came up with "magnanimous is me" but that didn't seem right in my heart or gut either. I then saw a raven and lock in my mind. Through interpretation, I came up with the final phrase.

Appendix M

Experiment Hardware and Software

Hardware and software used in the experiment are listed below.

Inside Los Angeles Closet

- Target Laptop #1 (beneath tiger beacon)
  - Computer model: ThinkPad T540p
  - CPU: Intel i5-4210M @ 2.60Ghz
  - 8GB RAM
  - 500GB hard disk containing 588,356 files
  - OS: Ubuntu Linux
- Target Laptop #2 (beneath parrot beacon)
  - Computer model: ThinkPad T420
  - CPU: Intel i5-2410M @ 2.30Ghz
  - 6GB RAM
  - 500GB hard disk containing 652,387 files
  - OS: Ubuntu Linux
- Both Laptops
  - Screens dimmed to black, and covered with cardboard shields and black tape while targets were displayed on screen
  - Ports, networking, screensaver, and audio disabled; unnecessary software removed
  - Monitoring system (Auditd), firewall (UFW), file encryption software (GPG), and password login enabled
  - Bash scripts enabled for copying new targets from USB stick
  - Image targets displayed on screen by "feh" image viewer
  - Looping video targets played on screen by "VLC" video player
- Additional Devices
  - Ring-brand security camera aimed at door with alerting enabled
  - GQ GMC-300E Plus Geiger Counter
  - GQ EMF-390 EMF/EF Meter
  - Temperature and air pressure monitor (Arduino MKR 1010)

Inside Computer Lab (Adjacent to Closet)

- Control Computer for Random Target Generation, Selection, and Deployment
  - Computer model: ThinkPad X1 w/i7-10510U Intel CPU, 16GB RAM

- OS: Windows 10 Pro
- Networking disabled, password login enabled
- PureBasic 5.73 compiler for random number and probability table generation
- Target and mock image files encrypted with GPG (AES-256)
- Powered off and locked in safe when not in use
- Web Server for Serving Mock Live Feed Images of Laptops
  - Computer model: Raspberry Pi 4 Model B with 16GB MicroUSB Card
  - OS: Raspbian Linux v. 10
  - Hardwired (RJ-45) to DSL Internet router
  - Unnecessary ports and software disabled
  - Password login, Auditd, Fail2ban, Nginx, UFW, GPG, and TLS enabled
  - Mock target laptop images loaded by USB stick daily, then served by Nginx web server software
- Workstation for Managing Experiment
  - Computer model: iMac, 4GHz Quad Core i7
  - Hardwired (RJ-45) to DSL Internet router
  - Unnecessary ports closed, firewall and password login enabled
  - GPG installed for target decryption
  - PHP scripts for calling Cloudinary to update mock live feed images for target laptops 1 and 2
  - PHP gcloud scripts for updating website and managing database
  - Bash and PHP scripts for updating Google Dynamic DNS with computer lab's web server IP address
- Internet Access
  - AT&T DSL router with firewall enabled, dynamic IP, 77Mbps down, 20Mbps up, port forwarding enabled to web server for mock live feed image serving
- USB Stick for Transporting Targets and Mock Laptop Images
  - Samsung 64GB USB 2.0 stick
  - Reformatted and locked in safe when not in use
- Lab Security
  - A second Ring security camera monitored the lab, with alerting enabled
  - The facility housing both the lab and closet was protected by physical security and a monitored alarm service

Cloud Infrastructure

- Experiment and Judging Website Hosting and Management
  - Google Cloud App Engine with Linux OS image and server auto-scaling enabled

- Website, judging, and experiment management pages coded in PHP7
- Data stored in Google Cloud MySQL 5.7 with firewall, failover, and backups enabled
- Dynamic DNS
  - Google Dynamic DNS enabled to route experiment mock live feed image requests to lab web server (<https://secrets.psiresearch.net>)
- Image Hosting and Mock Live Feed Image Date Stamping
  - Target and decoy images used for judging were hosted at Cloudinary.com (images uploaded only after experiment ended)
  - Cloudinary's service was also used to update the date stamp shown on each mock live feed image
